Graffiti clean-up absorbs funds

by Lynn Smith

"I might have expected it from a high school student, but not from a Maryville College student."

That was President Richard Ferrin's reaction to the graffiti that was across campus last Thursday morning.

According to the security report for Thursday, the vandalism occurred a little after midnight and involved six to eight people. The security guard approached the group on the sidewalk by the CCM, and they dispersed in different directions.

Business Manager Donna Davis said, "It is going to be an expensive clean up, and create a serious setback. This will take time away from things that need to be fixed around campus."

According to Davis, to remove one small section of graffiti in front of Fayweather cost $500. The maintenance people working on the paint had to experiment with different chemicals to see how the paint could be removed. A carpet care service's machinery seemed to provide the best method for removing the paint. Davis estimates that the graffiti will end up costing over $1000 for labor and materials. "This is money that the college will not have to spend on worth while projects," said Ferrin. "It's a waste."

Davis said, "I could tell, just by the way it was done, that it was just someone out having fun and they did not know how much damage they were doing."

The group that did the graffiti used a latex paint, which usually can be removed from permanent surfaces easily, but the concrete absorbed the paint so that it is difficult and costly to remove.

"We are fortunate that we have not had this kind of vandalism in the past -- and I hope this incident will not set a precedent for other similar occurrences on campus," added Davis.

Ferrin summed it up by saying, "Pride is an important thing for an institution and for oneself, and I think that the best thing that could happen would be for the group who did the act to willingly come forward and agree to clean it up."

U.T. reconciles skybox/ alcohol controversy

After a major controversy, the University of Tennessee has decided to apply its no-drinking-on-campus rule to non-students, too.

On Sept. 1, the school's athletic department reversed an earlier decision and banned alcohol from the expensive new stadium sky boxes it leases to corporations and alumni.

Earlier this summer, as the luxury stadium boxes were under construction, Tennessee officials said patrons would be allowed to store and drink alcohol in the 42 skyboxes because they are considered leased property.

Except for the faculty club, they would be the only places on campus where people are allowed to drink liquor, since the Board of Trustees barred alcohol from the campus when the state raised its minimum legal drinking age to 21.

"There was quite an uproar," Tennessee Student Government Association President Rusty Gray said.

"A lot of people felt very unhappy about it. This is a dry campus. Alcohol is not allowed on campus. All of a sudden there's a designated area for alcohol, and students felt like that was unfair. This shows that they listened to what we had to say," Gray explained. "It was a good decision."

"The university felt like it was in its best interests to have a consistent policy on alcohol on campus," said Tennessee Associate Athletic Director Mitch Barnhart.

"While the boxes were being leased," Tennessee Executive Vice President Joe Johnson said, "alcohol came up. Since the skyboxes provide a controlled environment and are separate from the rest of the stadium, we felt that whatever a person does, as long as it's legal and ethical, should be a decision made by the person who leases the box."

When students objected and pressured the trustees to review the issue, Tennessee's athletic department decided to ban liquor from the boxes.

"The questions raised by the students were legitimate," Johnson said. "Since the issues were being raised, we decided we'd go back to where we were."

Despite the ban on alcohol, all 42 of the skyboxes -- which rent for $24,000 a year -- have been leased, Barnhart said. "We haven't had any cancellations."

Allowing drinking in stadium skyboxes has become an issue on other campuses as well, such as Universities of Arizona and Arkansas, but the issue tends to fade quickly in many places.

A Servpro carpet cleaning employee removes graffiti outside Fairweather Hall on Monday, Sept. 14.

In 1984, University of Florida students protested a decision to allow skybox renters to drink liquor despite a campus-wide prohibition. Now, however, "it's a moot point here," said Student Government leader Jeff Jonason.

The reason, Florida Athletic Director Bill Arnsbarger explained, is that the skyboxes are owned or rented by the individual, "a status that apparently exempts the fans from the local drinking regulations."

who can't afford sky boxes, Arnsbarger added, would be impractical because "a guy going up and down selling beer would have to ask everybody for an ID. It's obvious that would present a problem."

"It doesn't bother me," Jonason said. "I don't think there should be alcohol in the stadium. The skyboxes are a controlled environment. It would be unsafe to have people drinking in the seats because they'd get rowdy and destructive."

This issue of the Highland Echo is dedicated to the memory of Dr. Russell Parker.

Violence erupts where compassion is needed

An impassioned mother screamed, "I won't let you kill my baby!" a middle school student sobbed, "He's just like everybody else." These days, the TV cameras bring a very modern controversy home -- the debate over whether children with AIDS should be permitted in public schools.

Dewayne Mowery tried to attend Lake City Middle School in nearby Anderson County. Another incident involves three boys, Richard, Robert, and Randy Ray, in Arcadia, Florida. Parents of "normal" children fear the spread of AIDS, even though these boys only test positive for the HIV virus, which may later give them AIDS. All four are hemophiliacs who contracted the virus via transfusion of blood components.

The Federal Center for Disease Control maintains that the slim-to-none chances of catching AIDS in cases like these do not warrant keeping students away from school. But superstition, fueled by a fear that is based only superficially in the available facts, is inciting people to deprive children of the important companionship and socialization that homebound instruction cannot provide. It is a loss that the Ray boys are all too well acquainted with; they were barred from attending classes last year, until a court overturned the school board's policy.

Although medical experts and legal officials advocate sane consideration of these and similar children's needs, a "plague mentality" persists among many parents. Some have proceeded to the unthinkable: real or threatened violence against the boys and their families. The Ray home was burned under suspicious circumstances; arson is suspected. Someone drove by the Mowery home holding out a sign that read, "Kill him, kill him, kill him." Understandably, the Rays and the Mowerys have given in; the risks they face from angry neighbors are more real than the risks area school children face from the boys with the virus.

The fear many parents have of AIDS is understandable, but I urge that these cases be treated with levelheadedness, and a consideration for the children involved. So far, their treatment has been appalling.

The Echo extends a welcome to all the many new faces in the MC community, whether they be among the faculty, staff, or students. And a special note to the freshmen: hang in there; you probably don't deserve all the ribbing you will get this year.

Pease: Face the challenge

by Ron Pease

Tuesday, September 8, marked the beginning of an adventure and a challenge! We, the students, faculty, and staff -- the Maryville College community -- face the adventure and the challenge together. What does this new academic year hold in store for each of us?

The adventure is the opportunity to share and to participate in making this the best year in the history of Maryville College. The campus becomes a live, vibrant organism because we are here -- together. We arrive on the scene with many goals, priorities, experiences, and abilities. As we work side-by-side we have the opportunity to share our strengths and aspirations with each other -- a sharing that is the heart of Maryville and the seed of the adventure.

But what of the challenge? Indeed, the challenge might be at the core of our collective presence in this particular place at this particular time. If each of us will conscientiously participate in the total enterprise of learning, then we will meet the challenge of the search for growth, development, and knowledge -- the mark of not only a community of scholars, but a community of sensitive, caring human beings as well!

Let us pledge to work together in the months ahead. Let us form an association that is based on the understanding that we can count on each other to regard all with respect, consideration and sensitivity. Let us work to learn as well as learn to work. Let it be said at year's end -- "We enjoyed the adventure and we met the challenge!"

Student: Dances need variety

Maryville College has managed to attract a wide variety of people to its enviable environment here at the big toe of the Smoky Mountains -- a group as diverse as, oh, say Run DMC and Dingo Oingo.

Having such a cross section of society gives us the perfect opportunity to share our different tastes, views, and perspectives on life. But without open minds we may as well be cartoon copies of each other.

On Saturday night, Sept. 13, a dance was held in the basement of Lloyd Hall. Several people came to the dance -- a good representation of all the facets of MC -- and I seriously doubt that all those present at the dance shared the same taste in music.

Strangely enough, there was a marked imbalance in the musical selections for the evening. Several songs were heard three, even four times each -- but since they were all of the same musical genre, the repetition hardly mattered. Saturday night was one long song with three brief interludes of variety.

The majority of the people at the dance had a good time, purely because those whose pleas for something different were ignored were determined to have a good time anyway. Towards the end of the evening, though, there was a high level of arrogance in the crowd -- displayed in blatant protests of The Song That Wouldn't Die.

Friday night was no better. I wasn't there, but I've been told by several people that it was essentially the same as Saturday. The only difference was that Friday night's dance in Davis was dominated by "hippie music" and Saturday's, by rap. I have no qualms with either one in moderation; surely, there's a "happy medium" somewhere. There are many more than two

Challenge makes transition easier

by Becca Mitchell

The thought of college always terrified me. I used to imagine myself sitting in a large room with 500 other nameless faces, furiously taking notes while listening to a monotone professor on some distant recorder. I thought about the fact that my name would become 419-82-5255. I would be forever lost in the thousands of human social security numbers walking around campus.

I have nothing against mass education, but I do know that it is not for me. Maybe that is why I chose MC.

College still seemed a little scary, so I decided to take the Mountain Challenge. I figured that it would be interesting and "break me in" to college life. I was right.

When some people hear the words "Mountain Challenge" they may imagine a group of freshly showered students hiking beside a bubbling creek, or a group roasting marshmallows by the fire. Frankly, it was anything but romantic. It was the most physically and mentally challenging experiences of my life. Okay, band camp might qualify also.

In the woods, the group had to learn a new communication system. It seemed very silly at first, but it really taught us to trust each other. We succeeded in many group tests. Picture, if you will, a group of 16 students standing on a very, very small box all at one time for almost 15 seconds.

In order to do the dangerous stuff, we had to wear some contraptions that looked like rope diapers. It felt even more perverted than it sounds. Of course, when I was hanging 25 feet above the ground, I was not concerned about comfort or looks. We rappelled, scaled rocks, hiked endless trails, used a map and compass (orienteered), and basically learned to feel comfortable in the woods.

Sixteen people left Maryville Tuesday morning as total strangers, and returned to campus Thursday as friends. We had shared something unique, and we knew it. It gave me a chance to learn about myself. I was able to make some great friendships.

College really didn't seem too intimidating to me after the Mountain Challenge. My freshmen orientation was a great success.

First days confuse and frustrate

by Craig Farn

I wondered if Maryville was the place for me when some guy with a mohawk and an earring looked at me and started singing, "Won't you be my neighbor?"

Moving into my dorm was okay, but filling out the damage report took a couple of days. I then asked my RD if I could get a better key for my room, and that person chuckled and said, "You should be happy if it works sometimes!". This is the same key I have to pay $25 for if it's lost! yea! right!

On the subject of fees, for all the fees the students were asked to pay, there could have been a computer provided for registration. Boy! Registration sure didn't take long this year. Next time, remember to bring a pillow if you're in the "A-F" line or if you need a rotating loan.

Convocation must have been great for upperclassmen. Did any freshmen get those jokes?

I am in the work-study program, and so I needed to find a job. The Business Office offered me one, and I said, "Let me get this straight, you want me to type my papers for classes and then type your work for you? No, I don't think so." So, I went over to maintenance to apply for a job and saw this guy with a chainsaw. He must have seen me come out of the business office. He started up the chainsaw and now I work for maintenance.

Maryville is more than a college, it is a state of mind. Maryville is also mysterious and not what it seems. Look around you, be an observer for awhile, and something that looked one way the first time may change and become different at a second glance. Kind of like the spam-loaf in the cafeteria, huh?

Inquiry fills culture gap

by Dr. Elizabeth Perez-Reilly

While looking for ideas for a special topics course in English last semester, I ran across an interesting quotation on a syllabus from Carroll College in Wisconsin. The syllabus had been used in a course on Third World Literature; and the quotation, which follows, was an excerpt from an article by Edwin Reishauer, a former U.S. ambassador to Japan:

Instead of living in a relatively remote part of the Western world, we now find ourselves living in a greatly shrunken unitary world, in which non-Western peoples outnumber Occidentals by close to three to one. We educate our children only about ourselves and our own cultural heritage and then expect them to grow up and live successfully in a unitary world of many cultures. By dealing only with the Western traditions, we unconsciously indoctrinate our children with the idea that all other traditions are aberrant or not worth knowing.

The quotation caught my attention because of the direct way in which the statement was made, and because of the truth of the ideas expressed. It served to reinforce my feeling that not enough attention is paid in American colleges to the

It's a different world for MC foreign students

by Kelly Franklin

Imagine yourself in a foreign land, far from home, relatives, and friends. Everything is different; food, language, customs, people. Suddenly, you must eat totally new foods, not just once, or for a few days, but every day, every meal. You must hear different sounds all day long, make some sense of them, and somehow survive.

Could you also attend college, read books and write essays in a language that you don't feel all that comfortable using even for simple, everyday activities?

If you can indeed see yourself in such a position, congratulations: you are a brave and sensitive person! Now, imagine how wonderful it would be, while in a strange land, if people were friendly, conversing with you (without getting impatient with your foreign speech), and if they made attempts to make you feel "at home." Wouldn't you appreciate it, and in turn appreciate and like their country more?

This is the situation international students on campus often find themselves in. Many have never used

MC: the right college decision

by Lori Chambers

I chose to come to Maryville College because Stan Anderson was at my high school for "College Day," and when I went to the MC booth and asked a few questions, he had the answers for them. He represented MC very well; to me, first impressions are very important.

The Admissions Office took great pride in keeping me up to date on what I needed. They would write just to tell me what was going on on the campus.

The most exciting communication that I received from MC was when the basketball/softball coach contacted me. I was asked to come and play for Maryville. That and the high standards of academics were enough for me.

After my first week at Maryville, I am really glad I chose to come here. It's a nice place.

Bradley slates Physicists for his MC debut

by Jennifer C. Worth

The Physicists, fall show for MC Playhouse and Frank Bradley's debut production as MC theatre director, has begun rehearsals.

This play, written by Friedrich Durrenmatt in 1962, takes place in a European villa-turned-sanatorium, Les Cerisiers. Liz Prior will play the sanatorium's power-hungry founder, Fraulein Doktor Mathilde von Zahnd. Joseph G. Chamberlain takes on the role of the brilliant physicist, Johann Wilhelm Mobius, who has been in Les Cerisiers for 15 years. Jonathan Yarboro will portray another inmate, Herbert Georg Beutler, who thinks he is Sir Isaac Newton. Leah Mueller will play Ernst Heinrich, a third inmate who poses as Albert Einstein; this role is especially challenging, since it was written for a male actor.

Donna Sue Hadden will portray Monika Stettler, the nurse who falls in love with Mobius. Laura Starkey appears as Frau Lina Rose, Mobius' ex-wife; Frank Schubert will play her new husband, Oskar Rose. As the teen-aged children of Mobius and Frau Rose are Floyd Dingman, Andi Bristol, and Staci Ames.

The role of Police Inspector Voss will be filled by Christopher Lilly. Jennifer C. Worth will play Martha Boll, matron of Les Cerisiers. Bruce E. Blaisdell will portray Uwe Sievers, the chief male attendant.

Some roles have yet to be cast. These are the Police Doctor, the Police Photographer/Stenographer, and two male attendants, McArthur and Murillo. Also TBA is the part of the dead nurse, whose body is a feature of Act I.

Some crew members have also been chosen. Heather Farrar is the Stage Manager; Bristol is Assistant Stage Manager. Steve Herbert heads the set crew, and Yarboro will design the show's lights.

The plot of The Physicists is sprinkled with humor and fraught with intrigue. A number of character roles flesh out the action. The Physicists also has something to say about the role of science in modern society and the uses and abuses of power.

This play is quirky but little-known among most students; why did Bradley choose it for his MC debut? He said of The Physicists, "I have been interested in this play for a long time." He has even taught it several times. Bradley enjoys the play and said of its content, "I think it remains timely."

When asked his opinion of the turnout at auditions, Bradley responded positively. Although the numbers -- especially of men -- could have been larger, Bradley said, "I'm pleased with the quality [of the readings]." He is still looking for actors to fill the uncast roles.

Students took time out during auditions for the Physicists.

Clubs abound at MC

by Marianne Rucker

Bored? Feeling "out of it"? Good news! There's plenty going on at MC. It is easy to enhance your life and the lives of others by getting involved.

Black Student Awareness has been around for many years. Besides acting as a support group for black students, BSA promotes black culture through programs and activities for the MC community. Activities include the MC Gospel Choir which sings for 30 or more functions throughout the year. Membership is not limited to black students. Anyone interested can join this multi-cultural organization. To do so, contact Cassandra Andrews (Box 2035) or Tracey Mosley (Box 2824).

The Fellowship of Christian Athletes offers Jesus Christ as Lord and Savior to athletes and coaches and to all whom they influence. They present the gospel through weekly meetings, their lives, and activities. FCA meets every Tuesday at 7:30 pm in the CCM. In a relaxed and informal atmosphere, guest speakers share their testimonies. FCA has an active outreach program. They are involved with the Blount County Children's Home, provide food baskets for the needy at Thanksgiving, and speak at local schools and churches. Membership is open to athletes, coaches, and anyone who is interested. Membership is growing and activities are increasing.

According to Steve Diggs, President of FCA, "This is going to be our explosion year." Contact him (Box 2061) or Jeff Fuchs (Box 2681).

Lascaux (Art Club) is for anyone interested in creative expression and art appreciation. The stated purposes of Lascaux include "To encourage each other in artistic growth; to stimulate interest in the visual arts on campus; to work as a group to bring in outside artists for talks, demonstrations, and exhibits, and to support these activities; to help with exhibits, demonstrations, and judging of local art shows"; and "to take trips to other cities to visit museums and galleries."

Lascaux provides artwork in various forms for other clubs and organizations. Last year's Choc Fest, a huge success, was sponsored by Lascaux. Two scholarships were awarded with the funds raised. The club travels to art shows, craft shows, and museums. A trip to Atlanta is being considered for this year. Date and time of meetings will be announced. To join, contact Jennifer Chastain (Box 2600), Selena Dockery (Box 2066), or Thelma Bianco in the FAC.

This is just a small sampling of extra-curricular activities at MC. There is something for everyone among the clubs, organizations and programs.

Dorms from p. 6

budgetary constraints, Pease feels this won't be a reality until the end of the year.

Other changes having an effect on dorm life include the alcohol and discipline policies. The alcohol policy, as stated in this year's student handbook (pages 15-17), takes a much firmer stance on alcohol awareness and education. The policy also clearly states the laws governing the possession and consumption of alcoholic beverages for Tennessee, Blount County, and the city of Maryville.

The hall discipline process this year rests more heavily on the resident director, giving him or her the option of deciding how to best handle discipline situations: by him- or herself, the hall judicial board, or Interhall Council.

But aside from physical and policy changes, there are also people and program changes. New staff members (RDs, RAs, and SAs) and new residents bring change to the character of each hall.

Several campus groups are busily planning programs to involve various halls. Pease is excited about the prospects for the new year, claiming that the biggest task will be coordinating all the events. Students can look forward this year to programs by Student Programming, the ILD Task Force, and the religious life groups, the Living and Learning series using faculty and community resources, and an expanded intermural program.

There are many changes happening in dorm life. They bring with them new opportunities to get involved, make new friends, and help make improvements happen. As the new year begins, in the midst of the newness are even more exciting opportunities for changes in dorm life and campus life at MC, waiting for students to take advantage of them.

Music from p. 2

styles of music in the world, and quite a few of them are danceable. Maybe Student Programming should invest in a variety of music, and we can share each other's taste in music rather than be smothered by it.

It isn't my place or anyone else's to say what is a "good" or "bad" song, but I think that a dance at MC should have a variety in music proportionate to the variety of people we are privileged to have here. We have Maryville College in common -- must we all dance to the same drum machine?

The Big Easy spices up screen

by Jennifer C. Worth

In the world of movies, there are comedies, dramas, cops 'n robbers "shoot-em-ups," and romances. Some movies even try to be a little of each and usually end up as hodge-podge and directionless. The Big Easy is an exception.

This is a multifaceted movie that promises a good time for all. Taking its title from a nickname for New Orleans, The Big Easy attacks police corruption and extols modern love, without being preachy on the one hand or tasteless on the other.

As half-Cajun, half-Irish Lieutenant Remy McSwain, Dennis Quaid is brave, breezy, sexy, and brash. Ellen Barkin plays Assistant D.A. Anne Osborne, who, at various times, displays schoolmarm strictness, girlish naivete, and grown-up sultriness. The equally delightful supporting cast is filled with eccentric and eye-catching characters, among them, Ned Beatty as the captain who is at the root of the department's duplicity. That duplicity is the source of the plot.

Oh, yes, the plot. It seems that all that rule-bending that folks in the New Orleans Police Department have been doing since before Remy's daddy was captain has been snowballing, and the D.A.'s office has gotten wind of it. What's more, the D.A. has proof of a bloody but profitable drug racket among the homicide officers.

In most films with a lovable scoundrel as protagonist, the hero justifies his rascally ways to audience and heroine alike by trouncing the bad guys and flashing his charm. But there is more to The Big Easy. Barkin's Anne is no impressionable doormat to forsake her principles for Remy's endearing grin, and it's Remy who changes. He must reevaluate his principles as a police officer. The net here is too tangled for a quick, cute solution.

This movie is a much fun as foot-stomping bayou music, and as exciting as hot Cajun food. The Big Easy is easy to love.

Foreign from p. 3

English outside of a classroom until arriving here, could your two or three years of foreign language training be enough to put you through college courses overseas? Would you be brave enough to try such a feat? And speaking of brave--what about food? Even native Americans surely sometimes wonder what some of the Pearson's fare is (or was), but at least we have a rough idea of what different foods are supposed to be! How would most of us do, if suddenly we had to eat dorm food which was totally foreign, unnameable, and unidentifiable?

I hope everyone will consider just how they would feel if placed on a foreign campus and think about how much little kindnesses (an invitation, some conversation, an offer of help) could mean. Many of the international students will be, in later years, leaders in their home countries. Think of how we can be a large part of their image of this country, how we can help determine whether other countries' citizens love or hate the U.S. Small favors now may be repaid in any number of ways in the future.

Please be gracious and friendly hosts to our foreign guests this year!

New faces, ideas spark Band

by Dan Fox

This promises to be a good year for the Highlander band.

The band has a new sound and a new director, Rick Carl. The new ideas include the bass and electric guitars as well as drum sets. "We may not be larger, but our quality has risen," said Carl of this year's band.

Some special events are planned, such as "Hot Legs" and "Sexy Strut" competitions. These will cater to the more exhibitionist band members; almost anything is possible in a kilt.

A dance will be sponsored by the Highlander band this fall. The band plans to get its dance tunes out and jam. "We aren't just for ballgames anymore," Carl said; "We're here to 'get down.'"

It may be the old Highlander band, but with a new director and new faces, almost anything can happen, so keep your eyes on the band this year!

Inquiry from p. 3

study of values and ideas that differ from our own traditions. Thus was born my course in Third World Literature, which provided a model for this semester's Freshman Inquiry.

There is, indeed, little time and attention given to the issue of non-Western studies on the average American campus. An examination of the catalogues and course offerings from many colleges and universities will show that most students in this country graduate from tertiary institutions with practically no exposure to non-Western traditions. Maryville College is a step ahead of many schools in this respect by requiring a course in either Asian or African studies as part of our core curriculum; but aside from this one course, the average Maryville College graduate will take no other course dealing with non-Western cultures unless he or she majors in a field that is somehow related.

While awareness of Western values begins in grammar school, as well as being an integral part of our daily life, the majority of students have had no introduction to non-Western values prior to their arrival on the college campus.

Freshman Inquiry should introduce students to new ideas; and non-Western culture is certainly a significant field that merits further study. That is why I decided upon the subject of Third World Literature for my Inquiry class. In addition to being a general introduction to literary facilities, the course is designed to encourage an understanding and appreciation of cultural differences through the work of writers from a variety of countries and literary traditions.

Literature from Kenya, Nigeria, India,

China, Brazil, and Mexico are included as well as two films, one South African and one Brazilian. Although Brazil and Mexico are in reality Western nations, they have much in common with the Third World; and their societies reflect values that are not always in line with those of the more developed countries of the West. Additional resource material will be contributed by faculty members and students who have lived and worked in developing countries. They will serve as guest speakers to the class, providing first-hand information gained from their own personal experiences. This will help the literature and the situations presented therein to come alive for the students.

In keeping with the general theme of this year's Inquiry program, "Change and Its Effects", an emphasis of the course will be the manner in which political, economic, and social change -- through revolution, industrialization, contact with other countries, and general modernization -- affects a developing society.

It is interesting to observe that progress, as we see it, often has a detrimental effect on the people whom we, as outsiders, assume that it will benefit. In the process of learning about other cultures, the students will be encouraged to examine their own values and look at their own society in a different light.

Also, through examining his or her own personal values and traditions, as well as those of other people, the student becomes increasingly aware of the fact that one cannot understand the external world without understanding one's relationship and responsibility to it.

Dorm life: changes in store?

by Lissa McLeod

Dormitory. The word brings different images to each person's mind. For some people, it is a haven of rest or study; for others, it is home; for still others, it is a place too messy to actually live.

No matter what image comes to mind, the quality of "dorm life" is usually an issue of importance for most college communities. As a new school year begins, it is time to examine some of the concerns of resident students from last year and look forward to the new year with the changes it brings.

Last February, Ron Pease, vice president of Student Affairs, asked for student response to the statement, "I suggest that campus life at Maryville College can be improved by considering and implementing the following specific recommendations:"

Almost 50% of resident students responded with suggestions; the highest concerns included the phone situation, cable TV, and furniture and recreation equipment for the dorms.

In response to these concerns, Student Affairs and Business Manager Donna Davis have been exploring options and solutions. Phones for rooms were offered as an option to all students during the summer. Davis reports that fewer than twenty people responded positively to the offer; therefore, the phone company will not install jacks in rooms.

More pay phones for residence halls also don't appear to be profitable for the phone company at this time, said Davis. Lobby phones with Knoxville lines will not be installed again until a security mechanism can be installed due to the "Phone Scandal" of last year. Administrative Vice President and Treasurer Sid Downey is currently working with the phone company on this project.

Cable TV appears to be a real possibility; however, there are a few hitches yet to be ironed out, according to Pease. Carolina Cable Company, the company who would supply the cable services, is not allowed to install pay channels in public areas -- such as the dorm lobbies. Until residence halls can come up with an acceptable method for who watches what and when, the cable TV will not be installed. Residence directors have been asked to work on this problem.

Davis is looking for furniture for lounges on the various floors of the dorms. Along these same lines, Pease said plans are in the making for adding a recreational area in Fayerweather. Due to

by Jennifer C. Worth

"He cared about things like fairness and justice and truth, and he felt their absence intensely . . . I think he understood the human heart, at least better than most of us, and he genuinely liked people." Library Director Joan Worley no doubt speaks for the campus community in general in thus remembering Dr. Russell D. Parker, who died unexpectedly on September 1.

Parker's many contributions to MC carry a legacy that will continue to last. He was the chairman of the department of history; he joined the faculty in 1964. He served as secretary of the faculty since 1972. A student-faculty committee chose him as the College's Outstanding Teacher for the 1983-84 year.

A member of both the East Tennessee and the Southern Historical Associations, Parker authored various publications, including "The Black Community Company Town: Alcoa, Tenn., 1919-1939," in the Tennessee Historical Quarterly in 1976. In fact, his colleagues in the History Department admire the diligent work that Parker consistently performed. Dr. Wallace Lewis said, "He got so much research done," Dr. Marjorie Kratz pointed out, "He was a tremendous worker."

In honor of these contributions, the new fund for faculty development, which was one of the topics at the faculty retreat which Parker was attending at the time of his death, has been named for him. MC now has the "Russell Parker Faculty Development Fund" to remember him by.

Lewis added, "Russell's passing leaves holes that we didn't think about." Not the least of these are in the class schedule, and these practicalities must be attended to. Dr. Charlotte Beck is taking on both segments of Humanities 180, and Dr. Scott Brunger is doing the same for African Studies. Kratz is teaching History 111.

The most poignant of these "holes" are, however, the personal ones. For in addition to his impressive professional record, Parker's personality touched many at MC and in the area. At the memorial service held September 6, private recollections vied with professional ones. Dr. Dean Bolden, academic dean, related statements by many faculty members, as well as his own; President Richard I. Ferrin added his views.

Parker's sense of humor is the first thing that occurs to many; indeed, this trait is, as Lewis said, "what we all appreciate about him." Students and professors value this trait; among them are Bolden, who told how Parker's dry wit eased tensions at many a faculty meeting, and Dan Fox, a history major, who broke into chuckles as he reflected on Parker's quips. Lewis went on to say, "He [Parker] looked on the light side, but he always took things seriously."

Other personal details stand out. Barbara Bolt remembers "the way his eyes twinkled over those glasses." In Dr. Charlotte Beck's poem, "Russell Parker, September 1: An Accounting," she also recalls those twinkling eyes, along with Parker's way of laughing and his "shapless jackets." Worley remembers "a smile like the sun coming up," adding, "when he smiled, you felt that things were okay." Kratz mentioned Parker's unflappable style: "He had a way of doing things -- so calm, so easy."

And then there's that beard, the distinctive, tidy goatee that was such an integral feature of his face. Lewis confided, "I've always envied him his beard," ruefully recalling his own attempts to replicate it.

Many aspects of Russell Parker were known only to a segment of the MC community. His certification as a high school teacher, for instance. In fact, he occasionally worked with the Education Department

MC hosts Piergiorgio Ricci, Italy's MVP visits

by Andi Bristol

Recently, the Athletic Department was fortunate to have a visitor from Italy -- MVP Piergiorgio Ricci.

Ricci is from Psaro, Italy, where he plays American football for the Psaro Angels. This year he was named the Most Valuable Player of the Italian-American football league, for which he received an all-expense paid trip to the U.S. from Promo Sports, a sporting goods franchise throughout Europe.

Ricci also led the Italian National team, as quarterback, to a European Championship after defeating West Germany, 24-22. Following the European Championships, he arrived at Maryville College on August 25 to observe pre-season football training.

He has watched the MC football team practice every day, as well as going to a local high school game, and an East Tennessee State University game, as well as MC's first game.

"Pier", as he is referred to by the football players, says the biggest difference between football here and football in Italy is the number of coaches; "In Italy we only have two coaches, one for offense and

Optimistic first quarterends in loss

by Joe Johnson

The Maryville College Scots suffered a disappointing loss to Wingate College, of Charlotte, NC, Friday at Maryville High School Shields stadium.

Maryville, however, had entered the game optimistically. MC head coach Larry Stephens noted, "We have a young, but very experienced team, much more than last year."

MC scored first when starting quarterback Russ Thomas ran an option play to his left, slipped out of the group of linebacker Petey Hunter at the line of scrimmage and ran 38 yards for a touchdown.

It looked like

Maryville might increase that lead when, on the ensuing kickoff, MC linebacker John Speight recovered a fumble by Wingate's Russell Bocker at the Wingate 27-yard line. The Scots moved the ball as close as the Wingate eight-yard line before, on a third-down play, Wingate defensive tackle John Coker picked a Thomas pass out of the air.

"We played well in the first quarter. We really looked sharp," Stephens said. "But with a young team like we have, when you score early and easily, it's sometimes easy to lose your intensity and that's what we did."

Maryville is at home again this Saturday, hosting Centre College of Danville, KY.

Student Programs: an active fall

by Liz Prior

Student Programming is setting up for a great 87-88 school year.

For those of you who don't know much about the group, the Student Programming Committee is made up of students from the college who want to organize and help with college activities, such as dances, parties, and homecoming.

Wendi Katzman and Liz Prior are co-chairmen of the organization. The staff advisor is Maelee Fiori, who is filling in for her husband Frank while he recovers from surgery in Washington. Anyone can be a member by coming to the meetings on Tuesday nights at 5:30 in the Pearson's alcove.

Some events already on the calendar for this semester include weekly movies, musical performances, and of course, homecoming. This year's homecoming dance will be held at the Airport Hilton; it is expected to be one of the best homecomings yet.

Another big event will be the pre-inaugural dance on October 10, a semi-formal dance in honor of Richard I. Ferrin's official inauguration as MC's president. Later on, a Wassail dance and caroling is slated for December. Musicians who are scheduled to perform at MC throughout the fall are Brian Huskey, Exit 69, Rare Air, and Relentless Blues Band. Stay posted for more events as plans become concrete.

If you want to get involved and have some ideas of events you would like to see happen, you are invited to make Student Programming a part of your year.

helping to instruct students planning to teach high school, a job he pursued from 1949-62.

Lewis revealed that Parker favored wooden swivel chairs for his office, and invariably left his keys hanging in his office door. One of his chief fields of study and interest was American Indians; Lewis said Parker was the History Department's resident expert on the Cherokee.

Parker hosted the history majors annual picnic for years, in a yard that showcased his passion for gardening. He was, in many ways, the consummate host, and, as Lewis said, "He really enjoyed having the crowd out there."

This combination of professional success and personal detail makes Russell Parker a name that MC will not soon forget. Each of the many people he touched will remember him in a very special way.

Hall I: Gamble Hall

by Barbara Bolt

On September 8, 1987, Hall I finally received a name -- Gamble Hall, named for Joe C. Gamble.

The dedication ceremony was attended by faculty, staff, and students following Convocation, September 8. Dr. Joseph J. Copeland, President Emeritus of Maryville College, presided over the ceremony.

Gamble, who passed away on May 28, 1987, served Maryville College for many years. He served on the Board of Directors for 31 years, 17 as chairman. He also acted as the College's attorney.

Comments by faculty and staff who know Gamble referred to his dedication to and support for making Maryville College the best institution it could be. Gamble piloted the College through several wars and saw many changes take place.

Even though it will take returning students and alumni some time to become accustomed to the new label of Hall I, the residents of Gamble Hall are glad to finally have a name.

Besides his involvement with MC football, Ricci has been to a disco with several of the coaches. He has also been to several restaurants and says that he likes American food, especially hamburgers, Taco Bell fare, and pancakes.

Ricci was an honorary captain for MC's first football game of the season. "This is a big honor for me," he said of being a captain.

Ricci, unfortunately, had to return to Italy following Saturday's game to prepare for the Psaro Angels up coming season.

Join us for ice cream social

by Kayoko Nagakura

The International Club invites everyone to an ice cream social this Friday, September 18. It starts at 3:30 pm at the International House, next to Sutton Science Center.

Ishun Pawan Admed is the president of the club this year. There are approximately 50 members, mostly international students. They meet monthly and plan a variety of activities.

Last year, the club participated in the homecoming parade. It also hosted a Halloween party, a pot luck Thanksgiving dinner, a Christmas party, and the International Dinner, which featured ethnic food prepared by the club members. In addition, the club had a picnic in Gatlinburg and, at the end of the year, a farewell party.

The International Club is a good chance to meet new people and make friends. Not only can international students come to meet new people, they can also come to share their ideas and feelings with one another.

American students, as well, are welcome to join them. A few American students have already joined the club to learn about different cultures through their relationships with international students.

Student Programs: an active fall

Student Programming is setting up for a great 87-88 school year.

For those of you who don't know much about the group, the Student Programming Committee is made up of students from the college who want to organize and help with college activities, such as dances, parties, and homecoming.

Wendi Katzman and Liz Prior are co-chairmen of the organization. The staff advisor is Maelee Fiori, who is filling in for her husband Frank while he recovers from surgery in Washington. Anyone can be a member by coming to the meetings on Tuesday nights at 5:30 in the Pearson's alcove.

Some events already on the calendar for this semester include weekly movies, musical performances, and of course, homecoming. This year's homecoming dance will be held at the Airport Hilton; it is expected to be one of the best homecomings yet.

Another big event will be the pre-inaugural dance on October 10, a semi-formal dance in honor of Richard I. Ferrin's official inauguration as MC's president. Later on, a Wassail dance and caroling is slated for December. Musicians who are scheduled to perform at MC throughout the fall are Brian Huskey, Exit 69, Rare Air, and Relentless Blues Band. Stay posted for more events as plans become concrete.

If you want to get involved and have some ideas of events you would like to see happen, you are invited to make Student Programming a part of your year.

helping to instruct students planning to teach high school, a job he pursued from 1949-62.

Lewis revealed that Parker favored wooden swivel chairs for his office, and invariably left his keys hanging in his office door. One of his chief fields of study and interest was American Indians; Lewis said Parker was the History Department's resident expert on the Cherokee.

Parker hosted the history majors annual picnic for years, in a yard that showcased his passion for gardening. He was, in many ways, the consummate host, and, as Lewis said, "He really enjoyed having the crowd out there."

This combination of professional success and personal detail makes Russell Parker a name that MC will not soon forget. Each of the many people he touched will remember him in a very special way.

Hall I: Gamble Hall

by Barbara Bolt

On September 8, 1987, Hall I finally received a name -- Gamble Hall, named for Joe C. Gamble.

The dedication ceremony was attended by faculty, staff, and students following Convocation, September 8. Dr. Joseph J. Copeland, President Emeritus of Maryville College, presided over the ceremony.

Gamble, who passed away on May 28, 1987, served Maryville College for many years. He served on the Board of Directors for 31 years, 17 as chairman. He also acted as the College's attorney.

Comments by faculty and staff who know Gamble referred to his dedication to and support for making Maryville College the best institution it could be. Gamble piloted the College through several wars and saw many changes take place.

Even though it will take returning students and alumni some time to become accustomed to the new label of Hall I, the residents of Gamble Hall are glad to finally have a name.

Besides his involvement with MC football, Ricci has been to a disco with several of the coaches. He has also been to several restaurants and says that he likes American food, especially hamburgers, Taco Bell fare, and pancakes.

Ricci was an honorary captain for MC's first football game of the season. "This is a big honor for me," he said of being a captain.

Ricci, unfortunately, had to return to Italy following Saturday's game to prepare for the Psaro Angels up coming season.

Join us for ice cream social

by Kayoko Nagakura

The International Club invites everyone to an ice cream social this Friday, September 18. It starts at 3:30 pm at the International House, next to Sutton Science Center.

Ishun Pawan Admed is the president of the club this year. There are approximately 50 members, mostly international students. They meet monthly and plan a variety of activities.

Last year, the club participated in the homecoming parade. It also hosted a Halloween party, a pot luck Thanksgiving dinner, a Christmas party, and the International Dinner, which featured ethnic food prepared by the club members. In addition, the club had a picnic in Gatlinburg and, at the end of the year, a farewell party.

The International Club is a good chance to meet new people and make friends. Not only can international students come to meet new people, they can also come to share their ideas and feelings with one another.

American students, as well, are welcome to join them. A few American students have already joined the club to learn about different cultures through their relationships with international students.

159 CE students enroll

by Jimmy Simerly

The "traditional" student at Maryville College will encounter growing numbers of older students on campus in the years to come. Those in the 18-21 age group will soon be interacting with more and more adults in the approximately 22 to 55-year-old age group.

Dr. Sarah McNiell, director of Continuing Education (CE), stated that the main reasons older adults have for going back to school are career-oriented. For example, certain jobs which require promotion are available only to those who hold a degree relating to their field of work. As McNiell said, people in this category want "to be promotable."

Some other factors which make adults enroll in CE range from simple intellectual curiosity to necessity because of a divorce, separation, etc., and the subsequent need for better job skills and higher pay.

Registrar Martha Hess stated that 159 students are enrolled in the college's CE program this year, down from 175 last year. Of these, 126 are women, 33 men.

The reasons the students themselves give for being in CE correlate with those stated by McNiell. Carolyn White, who is enrolled in Alicia Berry's daytime accounting class, said she came to Maryville College for "personal satisfaction" and because "I always wanted to go back to school."

Junius Dover, also in Berry's class, said "Someday I intend to work after my children [ages 12 and 10] leave home." Dover feels that supplementing her previous business-school education with a degree from Maryville

The '88 Campaign: What does MC say?

by Pam Gunter

Recently, a survey was conducted among part of the campus to see how much people know about the presidential candidates one year before the election. The results were both ordinary and astounding.

But before revealing the results, how much do you know about the 1988 election? 1. Do you know at least two candidates from each party? 2. Do you know what happened to Gary Hart? to Joseph Biden? 3. Can you name two famous religious personalities who are running? 4. Do you know who the early frontrunners are? 5. Do you know the basic platforms of the parties?

The survey, which included people from all four classes, ranging in age from 18 to 36 (no C.E. students or professors), showed that most people knew some of the candidates and to which party they belonged, and a few even knew how some of the candidates stood on certain issues.

Almost 90 percent knew that Gary Hart was a "womanizer," and 42 percent

Homecoming '87 Return to haunts

by Heidi Hoffecker

Homecoming -- the word conjures up images of crisp, clean fall air, parades, a football game, a dance, familiar faces, and fun.

This year's Homecoming coincides with Halloween, and the theme is, appropriately, "Come back to your old haunts."

Homecoming means a rush of planning and then working on the dorm floats by flashlight until the wee hours of the morning, so they will be ready for the traditional MC parade through Maryville.

It means mixing paints to get just the right color and finding the artistic people in the dorm to help with the dorm decorations and window painting.

After the floats and dorms are ready, there's a pep rally to go to and then the "Coffee House," a talent show. The show is a mix of students and alumni brave enough to get up on stage and "strut their stuff," from singing "It's Hog Calling Time in Nebraska" to playing a fiddle.

This weekend's schedule includes a host of different events, including sports. On Friday at 6:00 p.m. the women's volleyball team plays Tusculum College. On Saturday, the men's varsity basketball team scrimmages at 9:00 a.m. and the men's soccer team challenges Eastern Mennonite

At 1:30 p.m. the Scots challenge the Randolph-Macon Hornets for the annual homecoming football game. The half-time show will feature the winners of this year's Homecoming Queen and Court elections.

A reception honoring retired faculty begins at 10:30 a.m. in Willard House, the ribbon cutting and dedication of Crawford House starts at 11:30 am, and the annual MC Harvest Crafts Fair in the PE Building goes from 10:00 a.m. to 5:00 pm.

The traditional Homecoming Barbecue will be served outdoors Saturday evening from 4:30 to 6:30 between Thaw and the PE Building. The night's main event, the Homecoming Dance, begins at 9:00 pm.

This year's dance is a semi-formal masquerade ball. It will be held at the Airport Hilton will and feature the band Sage. Students, as well as faculty and alumni, are invited to attend at the cost of $5 per person.

The art club is selling masks in the bookstore, and a photography exhibit, featuring the masks, is displayed in Pearsons.

Racism persists; We need to make it extinct

Homecoming is a time for people to come together and a time for amicable cooperation. In this spirit, we should turn our collective attention to the glaring problem of racism.

No one can deny that tremendous progress has been made, but just as undeniably, much progress is needed.

Most MC students probably can't remember a time when legal segregation of buses, restaurants, and even water fountains was the norm. But discrimination still exists -- it's just not as obvious.

The "separate but equal" credo, one of the most damaging tenets of racism, persists, if only subconsciously. You can hear it in "... but I wouldn't want to marry one." You can see it in the way racial groups tend to socially polarize. You can find it in the derogatory racial slang that still marks our language. This "separate but equal" concept is the most damaging to true racial equality, because it implies open-mindedness while concealing prejudice.

The problem is not a black-and-white issue -- literally. From the Middle East to the Far East to Latin America, all races now have to co-exist in an increasingly global community. Racism becomes even more complex and difficult to overcome when it is compounded with cultural, religious, and political differences.

Is racism surmountable? Yes it is, but only if we make sincere ideological and cultural changes. Political changes, such as enforced intergration, are eliminating the outward manifestations of bigotry. Now we need to probe more deeply into our own attitudes, no matter what race we are.

Society will never become free of racial bigotry until all races are sincerely color blind. I hoped that my generation would first fulfill this goal, but I see evidence, external and internal, that this is not the case. Or it's not the case yet. We, young and old, still have time to make "racism" a word for the history books instead of a fact of life.

Editor's notes:

To the parents who want to ban Halloween celebration because it is supposedly occult and demonic: Any holiday, be it Christmas or the Fourth of July, is what you make of it. Evil is sometimes in the eye of the beholder, and a narrow mind is far more damaging than a plastic skeleton mask.

Fiore: Programming needs MC's input and involvement

by Frank Fiore

I am a 1983 graduate of Maryville College. While at MC, I was active in sports, theatre, the choir, Playmakers, and Student Programming. As of August 1, I took the position of Student Programming Advisor. Since then, I have had several discussions with faculty, students, and administrators.

Throughout these discussions, one fact became apparent. No matter whom I was talking to, campus apathy and lack of participation became the center of the conversation. I didn't really want to believe this, but I've found that these are serious problems on campus. Students are not supporting their sports teams, the choir, or the band. This is frustrating!

I am constantly bombarded with complaints concerning the lack of activities on campus, or their quality. Yet, students do not attend Student Programming meetings. In fact, it is rare when the elected representative for the dorms or campus organizations even make an appearance at these meetings.

Students have the right to a voice in their educational and social activities, but only if they are willing to make the effort to be heard. It reminds me of people I have met who say they don't like their congressmen or the president, but who didn't bother to vote.

As programmer, it is frustrating to have students complain about nothing to do when the stands are empty at sporting events, the concert hall is empty during concerts and recitals, the choir closets are full of robes that are unassigned, club memberships are down, and student programming meetings have ten students in attendance.

I know that there are more than ten students on campus that complain of nothing to do. I used to complain of nothing to do when I first arrived at MC, but I found out that the best way to have something to do is to do something about it.

There are more things to do at MC than at most colleges and universities, but you have to make an effort. If everyone who complains about nothing to do would come to a Student Programming meeting, a club meeting, a choir or band rehearsal, or a sporting event, the attendance would quadruple.

To find what you are looking for, you have only to get involved.

GPA Pressure: Does it hurt education?

by Andi Bristol

Grades. With mid-term having come and gone, they're on everyone's minds. Students, having crammed for their exams, are now anxiously awaiting the results, while professors are frantically wading through the stacks of exams.

Students, especially, feel the tremendous pressure concerning grades and grade-point averages. Because of this pressure, the sanctity of learning is compromised.

Too often, students will cram for an exam, memorizing by rote, instead of exploring in depth the material being covered.

MC is an institution of higher learning, not one where simply regurgitating the facts will suffice. Isn't the actual learning process more important than having to maintain a 3.25 GPA, as the Presidential Scholars must?

There has to be a better method of grading instead of the 4.0 scale, one that truly represents the

MC parking: Professor responds

In reply to the letter complaining about parking on the MC campus, I would like to point out that parking is always costly.

There is no such thing as a free parking place. At home, your parents pay to build the driveway and at the shopping center you pay in the prices for the same privileges.

At the college, the parking lots that were built two years ago cost $49,000, which comes to $4,900 in interest payments and $10,000 in depreciation per year. In addition, there is the cost of campus security surveillance of the parking lots.

The issue of fairness arises over who pays for parking privileges, which are costly. Is it fair for students without cars to be paying in their tuition for those with cars? I think not.

As for the faculty and staff, one of the costs of employing them is to provide parking. In a sense, it comes out of their salaries and wages.

If the students with registered cars on campus were to pay the full costs of parking them here, they would pay $40, instead of the $20 that resident students now pay. Be glad you are getting a bargain here.

I agree with you that there are safety issues involved in running stop signs and blocking the road in front of Bartlett Hall. Those rules need to be enforced.

I do not agree that students have a right to the parking places in front of Anderson Hall, so they can drive directly to their classes. We have a beautiful campus to walk through. We should not destroy it with more pavement.

Remedial toilet training: Student presents potty etiquette

MC has an abundance of bathrooms. These have been conveniently located for our use. There is an element of the community, however, which seems to be ignorant of their proper application. Please note the following normal public bathroom conventions:

1. The seat of the toilet is for sitting upon. Therefore, when standing, do not leave it down.

2. Even with the seat raised, aim is important, especially in the dorms, where people walk around bare-footed.

3. The shower stalls are not toilets.

4. Although the toilets have a large capacity, there is a limit. Do not exceed this limit by using multiple rolls of toilet paper -- clean wipe can be accomplished with considerably less. (If you need practice, at least flush before you exceed the toilet's capacity.)

5. Flush the toilet after use. Or if you are following someone who is unaware of this convention, flush before use.

6. When bowing down before the "porcelain god," be sure your offerings are properly received -- no god likes an incomplete sacrifice.

If any of these conventions confuse or bewilder you, please ask any normal person -- they will explain it to you.

Many of you readers may find this letter to be a bit simple and unnecessary (you are obviously properly trained), but there are those among you who obviously need this training.

If you know someone who is in need of this information, please show them the above suggestions for remedial toilet training. This may make your next trip to the throne as uneventful as it should be.

Hopefully, this trend of improper toilet use will pass.

students' abilities and reflects the effort exerted, and at the same time does not add any undue stress, allowing the students freedom to explore knowledge and learning for their own sakes.

Perhaps, if MC were to change to a pass/fail system with an additional mark for effort and individual progress, then this would be accomplished. Or, in the very least the grading system should include adjustments in the scale for pluses and minuses, as the Student Senate investigated last year. This system would give a more accurate representation of the students' abilities and could alleviate some stress.

MC has a friend in honorary alumnus Tutt Bradford

by Andi Bristol

We have heard the name -- Tutt S. Bradford. But who exactly is he?

He is an alumnus of a different sort. Last year during commencement, Bradford received an honorary doctorate for his years of service and generosity to MC. He is a longtime member of the board of directors and the donator of a journalism endowment, which among other things allows the Highland Echo to be printed.

At 70, he is presently chairman of the board, and was formerly publisher of the Maryville Alcoa Daily Times.

Bradford got started in the newspaper business as a carrier in his hometown of Spartanburg, South Carolina. After progressing to the advertising department there, he was asked to be publisher of the Cleveland Banner, and then became the assistant to the head of the chain which owned the two papers.

He became tired of the travel that this job required, so he bought the Daily Times with financing from his previous employers and has been a dedicated member of the community ever since.

Bradford joined the Board of Directors over 20 years ago. Dr. Richard Ferrin has gotten to know Bradford well since his arrival. The two have even played golf a few times.

Ferrin had this to say about Bradford: "He is very perceptive. I think he is a man who takes a lot of interest in being a good citizen."

When asked how he would describe Bradford, Ferrin said, "He has a generosity of spirit!"

Bradford's granddaughter, Catherine Cain, is a sophomore at MC. "We have a very good relationship, but I think he is a hard man to get to know,"

Bradford and his wife Elizabeth have two daughters, Debbie Moon and Nancy Cain, and five grandchildren, ranging in age from seven to twenty.

The Daily Times is a family-owned paper. Jerome

Moon, Bradford's son-in-law, is publisher, and his daughter, Nancy Cain, is managing editor.

When asked if it was difficult to work with his daughter, Bradford replied, "I think I probably demanded more of her than of the other employees."

College will give her a competitive edge when she does enter the job market.

Hess stated that CE students may choose one of five majors: Business, Management, Social Science, Humanities, or Nursing. The majority of CE students are enrolled in the Business and Social Science majors.

According to McNiell, CE evening classes and regular daytime classes are essentially similar. There are, however, minor discrepancies between the two. Evening classes may utilize a slightly altered syllabus and may not repeat material as much. Course objectives, though, are the same.

Once all requirements are completed, CE students may receive a Bachelor of Arts, a Bachelor of Nursing Science, or a Certificate in Computer Applications for Business.

"President for Rent": Ebersole takes new job at Webb School in Knoxville

by Marianne Rucker

Dr. Mark Ebersole, interim president of Maryville College from August 1986 to March 1987, is happy with his new job as interim president at the private Webb School in Knoxville.

"I enjoy Webb School and the people. The programs are strong. I enjoy working with parents who live in the area and are keenly interested in the programs," said Ebersole.

Webb School's new president will take over January 1. Ebersole will stay on at the school in another capacity, saying, "I plan to do some development."

Ebersole said that when he retired as president of Elizabethtown College in Pennsylvania, he "wanted to be a 'president for rent.'"

Maryville College provided his first opportunity, and he fell in love with this area.

According to Ebersole, his greatest accomplishment at MC was setting the stage for his successor, Dr. Richard Ferrin. "It was a very exciting period for me. I had a very pleasant time there. Tell everyone I love them all," he said.

The Archives and Special Collections room is a source of pride for the MC library, as well as for Dan Fox, who continues the upkeep and expansion of the collection.

MC's past can be found in Archives, Special Collections

by Julie Mullaney

More alumni than usual have been on campus this semester. One reason they may have come is to visit the new Archives and Special Collections room in the library.

When the library was remodeled in the summer of 1986, a special room in the basement was set aside for this purpose. The actual implementation of the Archives and Special Collections was not begun until this past summer, when junior Dan Fox found out about the project and volunteered to tackle it. This was no easy job.

"All the Special Collections and Archives stuff was stored downstairs during remodeling, and none of it was in order," Fox said. "I had to put the shelves in, clean them . . . then I had to put all the books in order -- about two hundred boxes of them. That took most of the time," he added.

Reference Librarian Rebecca Young thinks the Archives are important because " . . . it forms a record of the history of Maryville College and, to some extent, of the people who've been students here." She added, "Quite a few alumni have come by especially to look at old copies of the Chilhowean -- to see what their grandfather looked like in a 1910 football uniform, for instance."

The archives consist of publications and memorabilia related to the history of Maryville College. An interesting example is the Maryville College Monthly, which was published from 1898 - 1907. Also, there is the Highland Echo, from 1915 to date, and of course, the Chilhowean, from 1906 to date. There are also many old student handbooks and catalogs.

The Special Collections consist of around 2,000 books and periodicals that have been taken out of the stacks due to age, content, or value.

Young said that two areas of recent interest have been the church music collection, in which some material dates back to the 1800's, and "a collection of travel writings and memoirs from around the world."

The "Treasure Collection" consists of books that were at Maryville College when it was known as The Southern and Western Theological Seminary. Many of these were in Isaac Anderson's personal library and many of them bear his signature.

The room housing the Archives/Special Collections is kept locked because, as Young said, "There are some things there that are irreplaceable from an historical point of view."

She said that "anyone wishing to view the Archives/Special Collections should stop by the reference desk" to gain access to the room. It could be an interesting visit.

What's a welkin? and other questions

by Becca Mitchell

In 1819, MC began in a small log cabin in the woods. Reverend Isaac Anderson founded MC, then called Union Academy.

Anderson was of direct Scotch-Irish descent. That is why we are called the "Scots," why our mascot is the Scottie, and why our band members wear kilts.

You ask, "What in the hell is a 'welkin?'" The line in our Alma Mater, "Make the welkin ring" does not mean that you should give a small wart-ridden troll a bell and force him at gun point to ring it. The welkin is the vault of heaven. (The definition kind of kills the silliness of the line.)

Some miscellaneous facts to ponder: MC was one of the first colleges to admit women students. Also, in 1875, MC gave the first BA degree to a woman in Tennessee. Believe it or not, tuition for one term at MC in 1901 was only six dollars. Could it be . . . inflation?

Back in the late 1800's, men could join the Athenian or Alpha Sigma. Women could join the Bainonian and Theta Epsilon. Why and when did these societies die?

In 1962, certain rules concerning dating were set. For example, Rule #7 -- Dating in Knoxville for women other than Juniors and Seniors may be arranged occasionally by permission from the Dean of Women; and only bus transportation is approved. Groovy, man . . . an evening under the stars in the backseat of a bus? No wonder the sexual revolution happened.

MC certainly has changed its ways about many things. I can only wonder if someone, many years from now, will laugh at the way we did things. Probably.

Reception to honor retired professors

by Lynn Smith

Two members of Maryville College's faculty, Dr. Carolyn Blair and Irma Young, will be honored Saturday morning at 10:30 in Willard House.

Both have recently retired from the College's teaching staff. Blair was head of the English Department. Young was the assistant professor of the Sign Language Department.

According to Ellie Gilmore, head of the Alumni Relations and Development Office, the ceremony is a "celebration of the history and heritage of the Interpreting and English departments in the College."

All students, especially students who studied under either of these professors, are encouraged to attend the reception. Many noted guests, including members of the Crawford family, will be present at this and other celebrations during homecoming weekend.

Immediately following this reception there will be a dedication of the newly restored Crawford House.

Opening night nears for Physicists cast

by Ellen Foreman

The MC Playhouse production of Friedrich Dürrenmatt's The Physicists opens November 5 at 8 pm.

Homecoming marks the beginning of "production week" for the play, and everything seems to be falling into place.

"Everything" includes more than learning lines -- much more. Sets are being finished, characters perfected, and the cast is beginning to gel.

Liz Prior, who plays the none-too-mentally-stable Doktor von Zahnd, believes that initial disagreements between actors are productive -- that the "struggles are good for building character."

Chris Lilley, who plays the role of the police inspector, says The Physicists "has a message we need to think about. Our technology is running away with us, and humanity in general is not grown up enough to handle technology."

'88 election from p. 1 positions the Democrats take on the issues."

One well-informed, 20-year-old Republican decided that she didn't think any of the candidates were particularly well-qualified, but she "sure didn't want to see George Bush win."

As these comments

Director Frank Bradley chose The Physicists -- a "tragi-comic look at a post-atomic world perched forever on the edge of disaster" -- because he felt it would pose a challenge to any cast but would not be beyond the means of a small department.

He also hopes it will be "interesting, educational, and a growth experience" for both cast and audience.

Bradley is working with a cast of approximately eighteen, with members from all facets of MC life. They represent a wide range of perspectives, backgrounds, and levels of experience in acting.

Heather Farrar, stage manager for the production, says that it is appropriate for our time even though it was written in 1965 and hopes there will be a good turnout.

The Physicists is set in an insane asylum, but it has quite a bit of sane wisdom to relay to the world and promises to be a good show as well.

suggest, very few people support a particular candidate this early, but several support a party.

The basic problem is a lack of information, and aside from the local newspapers, most do not know where to look. The library is a starting place. There are several periodicals that cover the political issues thoroughly.

As Is: Lab's next venture

by Jennifer C. Worth

Auditions for As Is, the next Lab Theatre production, are set for November 19 at 5:30 in the theatre.

The script is currently on three-day reserve in the library. The director, Joe Chamberlain, urges anyone who is considering trying out to read the script. The cast will include six men and two women; the actors, except two of the men, will play multiple roles.

The plot of As Is revolves around Rich, an problems he faces. Chamberlain described the play's focus by saying, "It looks at the various attitudes and misinformation about this situation in Rich's life."

The subject is controversial, but not unique in modern drama. Chamberlain pointed out that there are at least four plays out about AIDS; one of them is a musical.

Why did Chamberlain select As Is? He said, "One, for the awareness. I think we need to know about this." To heighten awareness, auditions coincide with the CIV program on AIDS.

Chamberlain hopes that the campus and community will receive the production "thoughtfully." He said, "If it provokes thought, it will have succeeded." He added that any response, positive or negative, will be appreciated.

On the play's content, Chamberlain noted, "It's not as heavy as the subject comes across." There are light moments along with the dark, tense ones; Chamberlain said, "There's humor... real-life humor."

Tunnel: The Boss bares his soul

by Barbara Bolt

If a man's music reflects his life, then all is not well in the Springsteen home.

Tunnel of Love, Springsteen's latest release, is an album that focuses totally on relationships and none of these relationships is doing well.

The first cut on Tunnel of Love is "Ain't Got You," one of several songs on the album for which Springsteen alone provides the accompaniment on his guitar.

The shortest song on the album, "Ain't Got You" shows the superficiality of being a big star.

"Brilliant Diguise," the first single release, is one of two dance tunes on the album.

Between "Ain't Got You" and "Brilliant Diguise" are several songs that are no more than musical disappointments. With a few exceptions, the songs all sound the same, and it is difficult to delineate one tune from another.

Worst of all, the E Street Band -- the element of his music that makes Springsteen the Boss -- is almost nonexistent. Even Clarence Clemons, the E Street Band's saxophonist, is not heard once and only gets a passing vocal credit.

Maybe this is one of those works that the artist feels must be done: the need to publicly air his feelings. Unfortunately, the listening public will probably become very bored with the content of Tunnel of Love.

World Concerns to solicit aid

by Scott Brunger

During the Homecoming celebration, the World Concerns Committee will be soliciting contributions for a Free Hope Fund project in Africa. On Friday there will be a table set up outside the dining hall and on Saturday, outside the Crafts Fair.

The World Concerns Committee would like to aid the work of two Maryville graduates. Ed and Gloria Welch graduated two years ago, married, and volunteered for mission work in Lesotho in Southern Africa, teaching at a Masities high school. They plan to return next year and visit the college to report on their work.

Last year the World Concerns Committee raised $140 to send to them. They gave a scholarship to a student in his final year, who was faced with dropping out to support his family rather than completing school.

The scholarship recipient, Motsai Monareng, said in his thank-you letter, "If I still have a chance to go to school, I would like to enroll for the degree course in National University of Lesotho as a teacher. I also want to work hard in the future in order to give my brothers a chance to study like I will have done if I succeed."

Contributions to support this work can be made at the tables. Checks should be made to Maryville College, memo to Free Hope Fund.

Bradford from p. 3

Bradford, who recently retired, is actively involved in several civic and charitable organizations, including the Knoxville Symphony. He and his wife also travel a great deal. They are presently in Brazil, but have also been to Nairobi, New Zealand, Russia, and China.

Of himself Bradford said, "I am the hardest taskmaster on myself than anyone else, and I'm awfully hard to live with."

When asked what advice he had for aspiring journalists at a liberal arts college, Bradford said, "I would advise them to take a [foreign] language and read a lot of newspapers."

Tutt Bradford is a generous man, not only with his money but also with his time and energy. Ferrin said, "He is a model citizen."

Arthur Bushing: 40-year veteran of MC heads dept

by Marianne Rucker

Associate Professor Arthur S. Bushing has been appointed Chairman of the English Department at MC. He succeeds Dr. Carolyn Blair, who recently retired.

"There is no one who has contributed more, is more loyal, or more concerned about the students and the college," said Blair about Bushing. "We met in graduate school at UT, and he was my first contact with Maryville College," she added.

Bushing received his BA from MC in 1943 and his MA from UTK in 1948. He has conducted extensive research and studied at Stanford, the Sorbonne, Iowa State University, Duke University, the University of Tennessee-Chattanooga, and UTK.

He taught physics at MC in 1943. Then World War II found Bushing in the army, where he spent 17 months in England, France, Germany, and Austria.

In 1946 he was an English instructor at UTK, but he came back to MC in 1947 as assistant professor of English. From 1957 to 1965 he was dean of men in addition to teaching.

He initiated the CE program in 1973 and was its director for five years.

Bushing is well known for his Manual of Outlining and Research. It was first published in 1971, with three subsequent editions. Also known as the MC Outline, it has been translated into Portuguese and is being used in Brazil.

Over the years, Bushing has observed many changes in students. "Today, students in general read less. This is cultural and involves our whole society. Students are learning more from audio-visual aids than from the written page. Reading for pleasure is rare," he stated.

Martha Hess, registrar, assists Bushing with the English majors' schedules. She says, "He tries to see all sides of every situation. He's extremely easy to work with and conscientious to a fault."

Andi Bristol, a sophomore English major said, "He really cares about the students, which is evident in the time and energy he's willing to invest in them."

"Mr. Bushing is an extremely nice man and strikes me as someone whose extensive knowledge is not limited to his field," said Ellen Foreman, another English major. "I love his ties," she added.

His wife, Dorothy, who makes some of his ties, said, "He's such a hard worker."

The Bushings met in the dining hall at Pearsons while they were students at MC and married a year after graduation. The couple has four children and six grandchildren.

For relaxation, Bushing enjoys organic gardening, camping, and hiking. "Every summer since 1954, we have camped in virtually every state in the country." He said, adding "Some of the finest camping we've done has been in Idaho."

Bushing has been associated with Maryville College for over 40 years. "The chief reasons that I've stayed at MC are the school's openness to change, the dedication of the people, and the emphasis on a strong academic program," he stated.

When asked what lasting impression he'd like to make on his students, he smiled and said, "The excitement of discovery -- of what you find out about human nature through literature."

Volleyball: Lady Scots place at tourneys

by Pam Gunter

The overall record of the Volleyball Lady Scots is now 22-18, and their conference record stands at 6-1.

Since the last edition of the Echo, the team has gone 12-9, including two second place finishes in tournaments at Asbury College and Milligan College. At Milligan, the Lady Scots were the only non-scholarship team.

This season has been a rollercoaster ride for the Lady Scots and for second-year coach Kandis Schram.

Sophomore Peggy Lane said, "Either we're good or we're bad. Usually there's no in-between." Senior Karla Beard agreed but said, "As far as team unity and skill are concerned, this year has been one of the best."

Despite their lack of consistency, which Schram attributed to their youth and inexperience collectively, they believe they carry the advantage into their Homecoming game against Tusculum.

Coach Schram said, "It's going to be a tough, very emotional game, but if the girls play to their abilities, they will walk away winners." Transfer Andrea Myers added, "It's something really psychological. Everybody's up for [Tusculum] all the time, so I think we'll win."

All of the Scots quickly pointed out that they had just beaten Tusculum last weekend, and they would be looking for revenge. But Coach Schram feels that crowd pressure (some of the Lady Scots will be playing in front of friends and family members for the first time this year), endurance, and concentration are the major factors.

Neddo confident about lineup against East Mennonite

by Jimmy Simerly

The outlook for the men's soccer team is getting better and better, as they currently have a 9-6 record for the season, marking their first winning season.

Thanks to the efforts of Coach Phil Neddo and an excellent overall lineup, the team's chances of attaining even more victories this season seem very hopeful.

What is especially encouraging about this year's record is that Neddo has set a tougher schedule for the team this season than has been set in previous years.

When asked about his outlook for the Homecoming game with East Mennonite, Neddo responded that he has no doubt about the team's chances of winning. He also said, however, "East Mennonite has the ability to play big games on big occasions." Overall, though, the coach's level of confidence seems high.

This level of confidence can be partially attributed to the starting lineup, which includes seniors Walter Walsh and Nick Busko. Walsh is both a good soccer player and a good student, as evidenced by his being MVP twice and by winning an award for his study of physics. Busko is, as Coach Neddo put it, "a tremendous leader" and is the "hardest worker on the team."

Other outstanding players, according to Neddo, include junior Mike Rethwilm and sophomores Jess Dunn and Matt Granstrand, all noted by Neddo for their exceptional control of the soccer ball.

Also outstanding is

The Lady Scots are eagerly preparing for the Homecoming game with rival Tusculum.

Sports Shorts

(OCR) -- Drug tests are unconstitutional, says a superior court judge, ruling in favor of two U. of Washington students who challenged the school's plan to test athletes for drugs. The judge also issued a temporary restraining order prohibiting the National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) from taking action against UW. The NCAA, in turn, has petitioned that the case be heard in federal court.

(OCR) -- One coach, no bats, in belfry. Emporia State U. (Kansas) football coach Larry Kramer plans to sit in a campus bell tower until 1,500 season tickets are sold. The bell tower, named "Silent Joe" because it's rung after every victory, has been a little noisier since Kramer took over as coach. He's led the Hornets to winning seasons the past two years; before Kramer came, the school hadn't had a winning team in 11 years.

Hampden-Sydney defeats Scots

by Brett 'Prep' Stanley

In the Scots 34-14 loss to Hampden-Sydney, Mike Human completed 21 passes for 237 yards; 11 of them were completed to Ricky Miller for 135 yards, and two were touchdowns.

Leading the defensive team were Steve Diggs and Dwayne Sanders (nine tackles), Eddie Fuchs and Rodney Turner (eight tackles) and Hank Snyder and Rocky Casteel (seven tackles).

Even though the Scots lost to Hampden-Sydney, they have put that game behind them and are looking forward to playing the Homecoming game against Randolph-Macon, whose present record is 1-5-1.

AIDS: What are MC attitudes, viewpoints?

by Andi Bristol

AIDS: As college students, how aware are we? On Nov. 19, there will be an opportunity to learn more about this vital issue as Dr. Richard Rose leads a CIV on AIDS.

A survey of 20 MC students on AIDS awareness revealed that all of them knew how AIDS is transmitted, and about half of them had changed their attitudes towards sex as a direct result of the AIDS problem.

When asked how to prevent AIDS, Becky Shackleford said, "Abstinence!"

Nancy Phillips said, "I am embracing the new celibacy of the '80's."

Maelea Fiore said, "If I were a single woman these days, I'd be carrying condoms around in my purse."

On changing sexual practices, a senior who wished to remain anonymous said, "I wouldn't sleep with anyone who was bisexual unless that person had an AIDS test that was negative."

When asked if AIDS has had any direct influence on her life, Phillips said, "In Korea, some shops wouldn't let me try on clothes, because I was an American and I might have AIDS."

Besides the CIV, there will also be informational pamphlets distributed to each student.

On the importance of the issue, Ron Pease, vice-president of student affairs said, "We have a responsibility to educate students. So often students have a tendency to ignore the societal issues."

The issue also affected MC last year, when a nurse who lectures around the country on AIDS awareness was not permitted to distribute condoms, which she routinely does as part of her educational presentation.

AIDS is an issue over which most people, especially college students, are changing their attitudes towards sex.

AIDS may be the end of the sexual revolution.

Ominous 13 arrives; Is MC superstitious?

by Marianne Rucker

Triskaidekophobia: Fear of the number 13.

Thirteen is the traditional number of a coven of witches; 13 sat at the Last Supper.

Before Christianity, the Romans associated the number 13 with death and misfortune. It exceeds by one the number 12, which in numerology represents completeness.

When the number 13 coincides with Friday, which has its own reputation for bad luck, even those who claim to be unsuperstitious become a little uneasy.

Christ was crucified on Friday; Adam and Eve were expelled from Paradise on a Friday.

Until the end of the 19th century, Friday was the day for the execution of capital punishment and was known as the hangman's day.

There is at least one Friday the 13th in every year. 1987 has three -- the maximum number that can be served up -- in January, March, and now in November.

This triple threat will not occur again until 1998.

Friday the 13th has been considered unlucky for centuries, and this superstition lives on for most at MC.

Sheila Akins, executive secretary to the president, said, "I don't walk under ladders or step on

Soccer homecoming played on practice field not Honaker

by Barbara Bolt

"You play with the conditions you're given," said senior soccer player Nick Busko. And in defeating Eastern Mennonite 4-0 on Homecoming, MC's Soccer Scots did just that: playing on the practice field behind Lloyd Hall instead of Honaker Stadium.

During a meeting Wednesday night, Oct. 28, Athletic Director Randy Lambert said he "promised the soccer team they could play on Honaker, unless something happened."

The game was moved from 10:30 a.m. to 9:30 a.m. to allow the team to wash the soccer lines from the field, remove the goals, and put up the restraining rope around the field in time for the Randolph-Macon football team to use the field at noon for their warm-ups. "The soccer team was great with what they were willing to do to play on the field. The football coaches were also cooperative," Lambert added.

According to Head Soccer Coach Phil Neddo, the team was willing to do whatever it took to play on Honaker. "I even told Ron Bridges [head of the grounds crew] that we would line the field if he would put out the bags of chalk and the marking machine on Saturday morning," Neddo said.

Friday afternoon, however, the "something" happened: the new paint machine that makes the football lines broke. The lines for the football game could not be finished Friday night.

Neddo, however, found the equipment he requested to do the soccer lines waiting on him Saturday morning on Honaker field. "I already had one-half of the field lined when Randy [Lambert] told me that we would have to play on the practice field because the football lines weren't finished yet," Neddo said.

According to Lambert, the field crew needed "One and a half to two hours to finish the football lines" once the new machine arrived at 9:30 a.m.

This time frame would not allow both games to be played before it became dark, so the soccer game was moved to the practice field, which was not lined at all.

"I felt extremely rushed trying to get the practice field ready," Neddo said. "Two men on the grounds crew, even the officials, helped to set up the nets and the lines. But Eastern Mennonite played under protest [a letter was sent to the game officials and to the National Soccer Organization officials protesting the conditions of the game]. I don't think anything will come of it, though," Neddo added.

According to Donna Davis, business manager, the grounds crew "realized when the calendar [for athletic field events] was set, there was no way both games could be played on one field."

Monday before Homecoming, the grounds crew began to water the practice field to loosen it up. The dirt was plugged, sand was added, and a turf quaker with tines flown in from

Don't be carried away on AIDS bandwagon

AIDS is almost everywhere in the news; it's today's "issue." And this disease definitely deserves our attention and effort. We need to find a cure for AIDS, true. We also need to find a cure for Down's Syndrome, heart disease, and of course cancer.

When anything is thrust into the spotlight as much as AIDS has been, the public needs to be careful not to get too carried away. AIDS is far more dramatic than other major diseases and issues; it also is extremely value-laden. Perhaps that is why it receives so much media and celebrity attention.

And it definitely does receive media and celebrity attention. Scarcely a day goes by without a news story on some aspect of the AIDS issue. Scarcely a month goes by without a gala event of stars and socialites to raise money for AIDS research. And, obviously, that money is needed.

We must be careful, however, not to focus too closely on AIDS to the exclusion of other worthy -- perhaps even worthier -- causes. There are other causes -- diseases, social conditions -- that need attention and funds. But we as a society tend to have one or two "pet" issues that wax and then wane in our collective concern, such as Ethiopia a few years ago.

There's nothing inherently wrong with paying a lot of attention to a particularly topical issue. But it becomes wrong when, in doing so, we neglect the less sensational, "boring," concerns. Just because an issue has been around for a long time does not make it less noteworthy than a new issue.

Let's be very careful of getting carried away with our concern for AIDS. We know how it can be prevented, and we know that exhaustive research is going on to find a cure or vaccine. That's good. But we are reaching a point when other valuable areas of attention and research are neglected.

And in a few years, when the next big issue comes along, we should not abandon AIDS concern.

Editor's notes:

We are always glad to hear feedback and comments from the campus and community: letters, columns, whatever. However, we cannot accept anonymous material.

If you feel that the issue is sensitive or upsetting, discuss with the editor or advisor the possibility of having your name withheld from the printed version. We encourage everyone to leave their name on the final copy, since any issue worth writing about ought to deserve having a name put on it. In special cases, we will withhold a name; these letters and columns will bear the notation, "name withheld with editor's permission."

If you have a comment that you feel needs to be aired, please put it in writing and submit it to the Echo. And if you're concerned about signing it, please don't just send it anonymously.

Dance-a-thon: campus' apathy

by Nancy Oberholtzer

Suppose they gave a Dance-A-Thon and nobody came. Suppose some well-meaning individuals on campus tried to raise money for a deserving cause and have a little fun at the same time.

Well, the students were too wrapped up in themselves to care about a worthy charity, and too busy complaining about the lack of campus activities to attend a dance.

That's what happened last week. Student Programmer Frank Fiore advised me that the Dance-A-Thon was cancelled. It had been scheduled for November 14, but there were no offers of help or assistance from students. Nobody even picked up pledge sheets from the SP office.

The plans had been made to try to raise money for the Muscular Dystrophy Association by holding a dance. The participants would get pledges of money depending on how long they danced, or just a flat donation. It could have been a lot of fun. It certainly would have helped the MDA.

I spoke with the district director of the MDA, and she said this is a nationwide program. Colleges all over the country hold these dances successfully throughout the year. Except for Maryville College.

I wanted to call Pam Young, the director, and ask her what she thought about MC not having enough campus support to hold this dance, but I was too embarrassed. I wanted to know if any other college had cancelled a dance before, but I couldn't face Young, not even on the phone.

Right now I'm embarrassed and ashamed for the whole college. Are we so self-centered that we can't take a few hours to raise some money for a good cause? It appears so.

Was I going to attend this dance? No, I wasn't, and that bothers me. I should have been willing to donate my time, but I used my two jobs and my daughter as an excuse. Had somebody asked me to sponsor him or her, I would have, but that's all I would have been willing to do.

I'm sure we all could have come up with good excuses not to attend this see Danceathon p. 3

Be cautious: sex can be deadly

by Craig Farmer

In a society where sex is an expected occurrence, certain dangers may result from this activity. One such danger is the disease AIDS.

AIDS makes your body susceptible to many illnesses in the world. It breaks down your immune system, and as of right now, if you have AIDS, eventually you are going to die. Since the odds are that high for death, of course there is going to be a fear of having sex.

This disease has reached epidemic proportion and has created a nationwide panic. People have become afraid to have sex for fear of catching AIDS. Certain questions now appear in the minds of people currently engaging in sex: Who has it? How can I prevent it? What is AIDS? The best thing to do is find as much information on the subject as possible.

People who are actually having free-for-all sex are in the highest risk group. It's nice to have sex spontaneously, but nowadays it could mean life or death. Caution should be the first signal for people when choosing partners for sex.

There are many safety features on the market today, such as condoms. As an individual, one can pick more sex partners selectively and still use precautions to help prevent the spreading of the disease.

When someone says, "Don't worry, I'm safe," you could be playing Russian Roulette with six bullets in the gun. Try to be cautious and not stupid.

Litter mars MC's campus, says student

by Julie Mullaney

Fall is my favorite time of year -- the weather is mild, the sky is clear. The best part is crunching through all those leaves! They're all sorts of beautiful colors and they're all over the ground -- along with aluminum cans, potato chip bags, candy wrappers, and various other forms of garbage. I find it especially ironic when this garbage is on the ground only a few feet from one of the many conveniently located trash cans on campus.

If asked, most students would reply that industrial pollution should be stopped before it does any more damage to the environment -- yet some of these same people don't think twice when they drop their gum wrappers in the grass.

If you are someone who doesn't care if the campus is covered with litter, see Litter p. 3

Student urges MC to support Scots

Editor, Highland Echo:
"Homecoming '87" has come and gone, but the defeat of the football team still lingers. The team failed to score -- what was wrong? Nothing!

Many times on the fourth down, the team went for a first down or a touchdown instead of punting or a field goal. The fans were often upset with that move.

If we had succeeded in pulling the game out, it would have been a stunning victory, but it became defeat. The football team members appeared -- every time -- to believe that they could achieve their goal; they did on numerous occasions. If the players feel that they can complete a certain play, why not let them? After all, it is their game. They are on the field getting hit, not the fans.

I have supported and I will support the football team through whatever happens. The main thrust at Maryville College is academics, not sports. The players are also college students; they have a dual role: student/player.

If these guys want to go for it or the coaches decide to, I say go for it. They know what they're doing, and they ALWAYS give it their best shot on and off the field.

Danceathon from p. 2

dance. Some excuses are probably better than others. It doesn't matter.

Look at what all the MDA works on: muscular dystrophies, myasthenia gravis, amyotrophic lateral sclerosis, Friedrich's ataxia, the list goes on and on. What I initially think about, of course, is children that are unable to run and play. Children like my daughter, who is as perfect as a five-year-old can be.

That's when I feel ashamed of myself for not being willing to try to raise money to help. We have it made, and we're too selfish to share our good fortune. Don't say "not me," because Fiore said not one person picked up a pledge form or called for information about this dance. We're all guilty.

I've learned my lesson. A check goes in the mail today to the MDA. The next time this campus tries to sponsor a charitable event, I'll be right up front, seeing what I can do to help. I hope you feel the same way.

maybe you should stop and realize that you aren't the only one who lives with it; this campus is home to a lot of other people, too, and those people have a right to a clean lawn. (How would you feel if someone threw trash in your yard?)

Remember, also, that many people outside the college enjoy using the campus as a place to walk or run. We should realize what a beautiful campus we have and work to keep it that way, so that even people who aren't a part of the college can enjoy it.

It's time to stop ignoring the plea on the garbage cans and start to "help keep our campus clean."

Students in study hall don't need babysitters

Editor, Highland Echo:

Study hall is required three nights a week for two hours each night. Study hall is held on Monday, Wednesday, and Thursday from 7:00 till 9:00. Study hall is a requirement for all freshman athletes and any athlete with a grade point average lower than 2.0.

General rules are set down which all athletes must obey. The rules are: no eating, drinking, chewing, talking, sleeping, moving chairs, or wearing headphones.

These are the rules that the athletes can understand. The only rule that there is a problem with is the rule about not going to the library during study hall. One athlete stated, "We don't have any other time to go to the library," adding, "If we have to be in study hall then we should be able to use the library." That is the general feeling of most athletes who are required to go to study hall.

Going to the library on the athlete's time would be fine, except that the athlete has class during the day, practice until at least 6:00, then has to take a shower, eat, and be at study hall by 7:00. That give the athlete only about an hour in the library after study hall, which isn't time to get anything accomplished.

Tardiness and skipping study hall are reported to the athlete's coach and appropriate action is taken. Some coaches will make that individual athlete run or make the whole team run, and other coaches will make a player who was going to start sit the bench instead.

A few athletes were questioned on how they feel about study hall. One athlete said, "Study hall is a waste of time because not everyone can study in that type of environment." Another said, "Study hall is a good idea for the ones that can't manage their time."

Study hall is basically a good idea, but it could use some improvements. The tutors the monitors provide are students themselves, which means that they don't know the material that well.

One solution may be to have the monitors show up twice a week and the professors once a week. The athletes might not reject study hall so much if the monitors gave the athletes a chance. The athletes haven't done anything to jeopardize the trust between the athletes and the monitors.

The best solution may be to have the monitors treat the athletes like adults and not like children.

Hotline gives AIDS advice

New York -- Back-to-school time this year is dramatically affected by a health problem of epidemic proportions that demands accurate information, not hearsay or confusion. The problem is AIDS.

One of the most authoritative sources available is a toll-free national hotline -- 1-800-433-AIDS -- manned by volunteers at St. Clare's Hospital and Health Center in New York City.

St. Clare's has been pioneering care and counseling of AIDS patients since 1985, when it opened New York State's first and only officially designated AIDS center, the Spellman Center for HIV-Related Diseases.

The hotline, which operates weekdays from 9 a.m. to 8 p.m., and Saturdays, to 4 p.m., offers expert advice on everything from drugs and AIDS to testing and from emotional support and symptoms to sexual practices -- all on an anonymous basis.

Ignorance about AIDS can be fatal.

cracks. If a black cat runs in front of my car, I draw three X's in the air."

"I don't do anything risky on Friday the 13th," said Russ Thomas.

Emily Yarborough, director of Communications, said, "I'm not really superstitious, but I throw salt over my shoulder and avoid black cats."

"I wouldn't want to be quoted on anything about Friday the 13th," said Switchboard Manager Ann Morgan, adding, "I don't know that I'd want to travel on that day."

Lynn Hachenburg, secretary in Development, said, "I can't be superstitious about Friday the 13th because my youngest child was born on that day."

Suzanne Rowland, program manager for the Center of Professional Management, said, "One of my children was scheduled to be born by C-section on Friday the 13th, but I switched it to the day before."

"Friday the 13th! Don't go to work and lock up your black cat!" said Jean Clemens, secretary in Admissions.

Print Shop Manager Cookie Gose said, "If I go in one door, I go out the same door."

"Anything bad that can happen, will happen on Friday the 13th," said Mary Gaines.

Debbie Clinton said, "I am superstitious about Friday the 13th. I try not to go out of the house if at all possible."

Library Director Joan Worley said, "I'm a little superstitious. I had a wreck on Friday the 13th."

Dr. Charlotte Beck said that she's not superstitious, but that "there's good luck so there must be bad luck."

"Somebody said it's an unlucky day, but it doesn't change my way of doing things," said Jane Huddleston, secretary to the academic vice-president.

When asked if he was superstitious about Friday the 13th, President Richard Ferrin said, "Nope."

Mary Lynn Koch said, "I think of it as another normal Friday. It is Ron Pease's last day, though."

"I'm not superstitious," said Jeri Bodmer, assistant in the Communications Office, "but I wouldn't want to get married on that day."

Sharon Carey, assistant to the registrar, said, "The 13th is lucky for me, as that is my wedding anniversary."

Of Friday the 13th, Pat Heldman said, "I think of the movies and 'Jason'."

David Marcum said, "Superstition is for college students. As an MC graduate, I'm above that sort of thing."

Investigating AIDS

by Pam Gunter

AIDS is a killer that is reaching epidemic proportions, yet few people know enough about it to make rational decisions, especially concerning its victims and its preventions.

AIDS (Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome) is the final stage of the disease caused by the human immunodeficiency virus (HIV). The syndrome is characterized by a network of symptoms -- severe opportunistic infections, development of neoplasms (particularly Kaposi's sarcoma), and suppression of the immune system -- that combine to kill its victims. AIDS was first identified as such in the United States in 1981, but new evidence suggests its presence here 15 years earlier.

The highest concentrations of the virus in the human body are in the blood and in semen. Thus, the two main vehicles for spreading the virus are intimate sexual contact and the transference of blood. That is why intravenous-drug abusers, prostitutes, and persons with sexual partners in either of these groups are in high-risk groups.

Therefore, abstinence and not sharing needles are the two best methods of prevention. Researchers have determined that the use of a particular spermicide in addition to the use of a condom reduces the risk as much as 90 percent.

Infected mothers may pass the virus to their children. By the end of 1986, 394 children had been reported as having AIDS. Some had contracted the virus from blood transfusions (most commonly hemophiliacs), but most had been born to mothers in high-risk groups.

An estimated 75 percent of those born to infected mothers will lose the maternal antibody by 12 months, but this does not exclude infection. Little is known about prenatal transmission; therefore, it is difficult to determine whether the virus is transmitted before birth, through the placenta, after birth from breast-feeding, or otherwise.

Three viral strains have been isolated since the identification in 1981. HIV-1 is the dominant strain found in victims in the Western Hemisphere; the U.S., Canada, Brazil, and Haiti represent 80 percent of the 51,000 reported cases in 112 countries (36,000 in the U.S. alone). A second strain, HIV-2, has been found in West African patients. HIV-2 is related to but distinct from HIV-1. A third strain has been identified and is less infectious, but it may remain dormant for up to 30 years.

Presently, AIDS has no cure. Patients are treated for their symptoms, known as AIDS-related complexes (ARC). Two drugs, ribavirin and amplitgen, have been tested on AIDS patients and are awaiting FDA approval.

Ribavirin has prevented the recurrence of pneumocystic pneumonia, an ARC and frequent cause of death in AIDS patients, in 7.5 percent of the tested patients.

Amplitgen has changed HIV counts and immune response capability in all of the patients it was tested on. However, it has not been administered to a large population, and it is still too early to judge its true effectiveness.

Another possible cure is a growth hormone that stimulates cells in bone marrow. This can increase the number of white blood cells, increasing ability to fight infection.

GM-CSF, granulocyte-macrophage colony-stimulating factor, is another possibility. When combined with drugs that slow viral replication, it has a profound impact, but it, too, lacks widespread testing.

Other research has been aimed at prevention: creating a vaccine. Researchers at the National Cancer Institute have determined the nucleotide sequence of an AIDS-like virus. They may now be able to determine why certain strains do not cause the disease which, in turn, will help advance vaccine development.

An untested vaccine has been developed and is awaiting approval. MicroGeneSys is scheduled to be tested within the next two or three months on 63 volunteers.

The volunteers must be healthy and must test negative for the HIV virus. Again, only time will tell.

Money, as well as time, is a factor that will determine AIDS research and education limits. Almost one billion dollars in U.S. federal funds has been spent on research, patient care, education, and prevention. These costs are predicted to exceed $37 billion by mid-1991.

Ron Pease has served as vice-president of Student Affairs from February 1986 until resigning on Nov. 13.

Pease leaves MC

by Andi Bristol

Ron Pease, vice-president for Student Affairs, has resigned from his position. He has accepted a job with the Department of Administration of the State of Florida as chief of personnel.

Pease assumed his duties at MC in February 1986. Under his direction, the Office of Student Affairs has been instrumental in relocating the health service for all students to Blount Memorial Hospital, sponsored the growth of the Portfolio Project, instituting a pre-orientation camp for entering freshmen, the construction of student offices on the second floor of Fayerweather, improving the Commuter Lounge, and the renovation of Crawford House, just to name a few projects.

"Perhaps the greatest of these programs in progress is the Wellness Program. We have brought in people from the community and made information concerning nutrition, dieting, and exercise available to students," Pease said.

Of his new position, Pease said, "I want to emphasize that I am leaving for the best of reasons -- with no hard feelings. I will miss MC and miss being able to see the great things that are going to happen under the direction of Dr. Ferrin."

Pease's last day at MC will be Friday, Nov. 13, and he will assume his new position in Florida on Nov. 16.

Campus parking

by Jimmy Simerly

Those faculty, staff, and students habitually cited for traffic and parking violations will soon find themselves facing stiffer fines and penalties.

Routine penalties for parking violations include a warning for the first offense, a citation for the second, and a citation, as well as removal and impoundment of the vehicle, on the third and subsequent offenses. In addition to payment of the citation, offenders are responsible for paying the towing and impoundment fees.

Parking violations include such things as parking in tow-away zones, parking on the grass, and improper registration or non-registration of vehicles.

Routine penalties for traffic violations such as exceeding the speed limit, running stop signs, and so forth include a warning on the first offense and a citation on the second and subsequent offenses.

Students who have not registered their vehicles or who have failed to pick up their parking stickers will be subject to a cumulative $5.00 per month fine. In other words, on the seventh of every month that a vehicle is unregistered, $5.00 will be added to the fine.

If any faculty member, staff person, or student feels he or she has been unfairly cited, he or she may appeal in writing to the Student Affairs Office or to Kristy Miller, chairperson of the Traffic Committee, at Box 2141, within three working days.

The tennis court lot is for commuters, faculty, and tennis players only. Also, resident students are discouraged from driving to classes or other campus functions.

If students do not pay fines and citations, grades and or transcripts will be withheld. Faculty and staff members not paying will have the money deducted from their paychecks.

REM hits Top 20

by Russ Thomas

With their new album Document, REM has finally hit the Top 20 list for pop music. Being their fifth album, Document is by far the most accessible.

This accessibility has given their music a more widespread appeal. Before this album, REM had built a huge cult following over their eight years of music, but now the commercial audience has had their eyes opened to the catchy but subtle group.

REM insists that they don't know how to be mainstream; nevertheless, their music is becoming such, primarily because of their last two albums, Life's Rich Pageant and Document. On these last two albums, Michael Stipe, the lead singer, has indeed sung more clearly the lyrics of the songs.

The music is upbeat and very thought-provoking. Many melodies can be heard in their music. Each member plays an influential part of the band's music. The guitars produce many sounds other than the traditional ones. This makes for an explosive sound.

The first three albums, Murmur, Reckoning and Fables of the Reconstruction, contain lyrics which at first sound jumbled and muttered. The lyrics are the most amazing part of the band. They produce in the mind pictures and images which the group stands. They have a meaning in their music. They sway listeners to believe the way they do on issues of politics, sociology, and life in general. It is distinctive sound and image that they produce. This sound appealed to their cult followers but never got into the veins of commercial listeners.

Although I have been an REM fan since Murmur (their first album), I don't detect as much of a change as would those who infrequently listen to the band. I enjoy the first album as much as the last and the second as much as the fourth.

The band, which originated at the University of Georgia in Athens, is made up of Michael Stipe, lead singer; Mike Mills, bass; Peter Buck, lead; and Bill Perry,

Koehl displays diversity Senior FAC display shows

by Lissa McLeod

Senior Nancy Koehl's artwork is on display at the Fine Arts Center gallery during November. Her display demonstrates several different techniques, varied subjects, and a wide range of artistic mediums.

The different techniques displayed include watercolor, lithograph, intaglio, collagraph, pencil drawing, photographs, and acrylic painting. Thelma Bianco, Koehl's studio instructor, said that much of Nancy's interest has been in printing processes and pencil sketches.

Both the intaglio and collagraph techniques are printmaking processes, one with sketches scratched into a plastic plate, and the other with shapes glued onto a flat surface.

Her watercolor pictures include both a dry-brush technique with a series of four ink and watercolor sketches and a wet technique used in a watercolor of MC Scots baseball paraphernalia.

Several of her items display an interest in people -- some frozen in a moment of action and others examined with a "face and hands" motif in a variety of media. Some other subjects include animals and still life.

With the diversity of her exhibit, Koehl has clearly experimented with many different techniques, although Bianco claimed "... lots of her experimental work is not displayed."

Koehl is an Art Education major, gaining certification to teach at the elementary and secondary levels. She also has a second teaching concentration in physical education. She is currently student teaching at both elementary and intermediate schools, having already done some student teaching at William Blount High School.

Also to her credit, Koehl has won the rising sophomore, junior, and senior art awards with her drawings since beginning her study at Maryville College.

Koehl's November exhibit clearly indicates that she has devoted much time and energy to her artwork. She has also brought to her art a willingness to experiment in various mediums.

Given her willingness to experiment, it will be interesting to see several years from now how Koehl has continued to develop as an artist.

California -- was used to make the field conducive to a game situation. Finally, on Friday afternoon a steam roller was pulled off its job at Harrison's Construction to roll the field.

According to Bridges, the grounds crew "pulled 36-hour shifts and the college spent over $2,700 to get the practice field ready for that day."

Neddo said, "I agreed, when we set the calendar, to use the practice field for Homecoming if [the Grounds Crew] worked on it to get it ready. But they only worked on it the first week of school."

He added that he was not aware of the work that was being done to the field during the week before Homecoming.

Neddo said, "My biggest disappointment was that my two seniors [Nick Busko and Walt Walsh] could not play their last Homecoming game at the stadium."

The players echoed their coach. "On the playing field the quality of play is affected, but you just play the game," Walsh said.

Busko added, "There were splotches of concrete from off the steam roller on the field, and it was hard to tell exactly where the ball would bounce."

Lambert summed up the situation by saying, "It was an unfortunate set of circumstances. The soccer team needs a good game field, and I will do my best to provide a good playing field. But it takes time."

Messiah to open season

by Ellen Foreman

"It's long, It's high. It's hard. But we can handle it."

So said a soprano in the MC Concert Choir about Handel's oratorio, The Messiah, which will be performed on Sunday, November 22, at 3:30 p.m. by three community groups -- the MC Choir, the Foothills Chorale, and the Foothills Symphony Orchestra.

The Messiah is a milestone at the beginning of the Christmas season, like the decorations in department stores that seem to go up a little closer to Halloween each year. Choral groups all over the world prepare performances of the first two parts of the parts of the piece (the third part is usually performed at Easter) to celebrate the holiday season.

There are several soloists for the performance, and the list includes three MC Choir members: Tammy Guffey, soprano; Melissa Blough, soprano; and Bobby Montgomery, tenor. Alto Cindy Claborn, an MC alumna, is also a soloist for The Messiah.

Members of the Foothills Chorale with solos are Dorothy Bushing, soprano; Frances Gorman, alto; Harry House, tenor; and Dr. George Hall, bass.

BCCP keeps active in theatre

by Nancy Oberholtzer

The cast of characters includes a lawyer best known for his television role as a drunk driver who gets killed in a car wreck, an advertising executive who wears a Hawaiian print shirt and a baseball cap to work, a real estate developer who only comes to life every hundred years or so and speaks in a strange combination of Scottish, Olde English and East Tennessee, and a variety of others.

What is this group of slightly off-the-wall individuals? It's the Blount County Community Playhouse (BCCP). These regulars and anyone else they can recruit get together several times throughout the year and put on plays at local facilities.

The BCCP was formed in 1980, and has continuously grown in size and quality of production. It began as a shoestring operation, but has grown to a sizeable company of about 25 members with a budget to put on the extravagant Sugar Babies this summer.

Marcia Keith heads dept.

by Jimmy Simerly

Dr. Marcia Keith, new head of the Education Department, sits in her office, speaking matter-of-factly about herself and her career. While she is modest when talking about her achievements, it is obvious that she is proud of what she does.

When asked her reasons for getting into education, Keith responded, "[I] could envision myself teaching," adding that she does not remember wanting to be anything else. Keith takes her job seriously, as she feels that being a teacher is at once both a privilege and a responsibility.

Keith first came to East Tennessee in the summer of 1981. Before, she lived in Maine, and was a principal in Freeport. Keith received her B.A. from the University of Massachusetts and then taught for three years. Subsequently, she went to Harvard and there received her Master of Education. She then taught again for seven years and became a principal in Freeport.

In 1983, Keith enrolled at UTK, and worked as project director for teacher education simulations. Keith recently graduated and received her Ph.D. in education.

What does Keith like best about working at Maryville College? She said, "The way it feels when I walk around campus kicking the leaves." She enjoys the personal feeling which can be expressed at Maryville because of its small size.

Keith came to the immediate area for several reasons. One is the fact that East Tennessee "doesn't have 27 months of winter."

What is most apparent in talking with Keith is her love of the environment and the personal feelings she is able to express in a college community this size. With her dedication, MC's education program should be well-founded in the future.

director of the Institute for Lifestyle Development, is chief instructor.

The Isshin-ryu school has been in existence in Blount County for 21 years, making it the oldest karate school in the area. It came to Maryville College 10 years ago because Guillaume was here, and also because MC offered its facilities to the Isshin-ryu school for its use.

The Isshin-ryu school at MC is affiliated with the International Isshin-ryu Karate Association. Each year, the association sponsors a tournament, and this year was held on October 17, here at MC. There were about 500 competitors in the tournament and many spectators, including people from Florida, New York, New Jersey, California, and even Canada.

According to Guillaume, a fifth-degree black belt, those who take karate do it "for real personal reasons, so everyone probably has a different goal." He added, "Some do it for a workout, others find it a practical way to defend themselves."

Isshin-ryu differs from other forms of martial arts in that it uses different techniques, body movements, and natural stances. There are 10 black belts in the class now, and most of the people in the class are from the community. Many find that taking karate is a good way to stay active and avoid becoming out of shape.

The classes are open to students, and the cost is $45 per quarter. The classes meet every Tuesday and Thursday night in the Alumni Gym.

BCCP from p. 5

Clifford said, "We used to have to put on a show with a costume budget of $30. Now we are going to Omaha to get the entire set for Sugar Babies. Two years ago that would not have been possible."

The BCCP usually has two dinner theatres and one musical per year. The dinner theaters tend to have small casts and are performed at the Armed Forces Club at the McGhee Tyson Airbase. The musicals are grand affairs with large casts and often full orchestras. The musicals are generally in the summer at the Maryville College Theatre.

Auditions are always open to the public, and no previous experience is necessary. Auditions are usually announced in the Maryville-Alcoa Daily Times a week or so before they are held. Plans are being made to advertise on campus for future productions, because the BCCP would like to see more involvement from MC students, faculty, and staff.

MC has been actively involved with the BCCP in the past. Jennifer Worth had a starring role in Greater Tuna in May, 1986. Dan Reynolds portrayed Dr. Einstein in Arsenic and Old Lace, presented at the MC theatre in February 1986.

Jonathon Yarboro was lighting designer, Sandy Brennan was stage manager, and John Carter handled the rail for Music Man in July, 1986, also at the MC theatre. Nancy Oberholtzer had a role in The Oldest Living Graduate in November 1986, and was sound engineer for Don't Drink the Water last May.

This past summer, Brigadoon, presented at the MC theatre, involved several MC people. Joe Chamberlain had a major role, with a supporting cast including Maelea Fiore, Tammy drummer.

Since they met, these guys have done things differently. They released their first single in 1980 ("Radio Free Europe") by themselves and toured the country without an album release or record label support.

This paid off when the record label of IRS signed the band to a contract. From there, REM has gone nowhere but up. They are finally getting the credit I think they deserve.

If you haven't been an REM listener before, you should try Document. Chances are you might buy a previous album after the music has gotten into your system.

They are a neat band and worry only about their music and nothing else. If the album goes to Number One, I don't think you'll see them move to L.A. and start wearing spandex pants and perms. That's for the heavy metal and pop groups to take care of. REM will just stay in Athens and make good sound.

Grads earn more, Bureau

Washington, D.C. (CPS) -- It pays to graduate from college.

College students who graduate earn an average of $672 more a month than students who drop out of college before graduating, the U.S. Census Bureau estimated in a reported released Oct. 1.

They gross an average of $1,841 a month, while people who hold two-year degrees average $1,346 a month.

"The piece of paper," concluded the Census Bureau's Robert Kominski in a statement accompanying the report, "means something. [Diplomas] mean something to employers and to the success of individuals."

Law, dental, and medical school graduates, the study found, earned about five times as much per month as high school dropouts.

People who earned doctorates made a little more than four times more than high school dropouts, who average $693 a month, while students with four-year undergraduate degrees made more than twice as much.

The Census Bureau found that about 21 percent of the population holds a college degree.

Athletes willing to risk injury

by Barbara Bolt

Remember last fall when it seemed as if everyone that played a sport spent at least a few days on crutches? Things appear to be somewhat better this year as the three fall varsity teams -- football, soccer, and volleyball -- complete their playing seasons.

In conducting interviews with various members of each team, the feeling of a competitive spirit comes from the athletes. When questioned about the effects of being injured, the players all felt that being injured was worth the risk as long as they were able to play their sport.

Nick Busko, a senior on the soccer team, said, "We do not have many people to play as substitutes. So if we get injured, we just keep on playing."

Busko went on to say that the increased level of conditioning during pre-season this year seems to have cut back on some of the injuries.

Even though volleyball is classified as a non-contact sport, the team sustains its share of injuries. Lori Yancey, a freshman on the team, said that ankles and backs are big problem areas. "We often run right into each other in going for the ball," she added.

The football team, playing a full contact sport, incurs the most injuries. Two players, who requested to have their names withheld, said that they were here to play their sport, no matter the risks of playing college ball.

When asked about having to sit out a game because of an injury, the answers rarely varied. Yancey said, "It was frustrating to sit on the sidelines and just watch."

Busko echoed her sentiments, "If one of us is injured, we get taped and go back out on the field. But if we get taken out, it is hard to just watch." The two football players agreed. One added, "I get as mad as hell when I have to sit out."

The student trainers receive good comments from the athletes. In addition, the trainers enjoy their job. Sherri Jones, a senior pre-physical therapy major, said that the job is good

The football team had plenty of pep as it rode in the Homecoming Parade on Oct. 30.

A different ballgame in Europe

by Russ Thomas

Maryville College coaches Paul Anagnostis and Tony Mitchell spent five-and-one-half months of their spring and summer in Europe, particularly Switzerland, as player-coaches for a European football team. Recently, Coach Anagnostis spoke about his experiences in Europe.

Unlike America, where young children play football and continue the interest until it's all one can do to stay awake in an easy chair and watch it on TV, the European countries have only club teams.

In a country where soccer is a way of life, enthusiasm for American football is growing rapidly. Although the club teams might have a sponsor, the team members usually buy their own equipment and pay membership dues to cover any expenses they might incur.

These players play for the fun of it and they enjoy the privilege of learning the game. The rules and regulations are the same but due to the newness of the program, the caliber of play is much simplified. The players are oftentimes great athletes but because the game is new to them, they haven't experience. "I love working with people. It makes me feel good knowing that I have helped someone out," Jones added.

All of the athletes interviewed certainly had one thing in common: they all enjoy playing their sport so much that they are willing to pay the price of an injury.

developed their "football senses" yet. Many of the players play as a hobby, some of them have families to support, and they all have job to attend to. The competition is great, nonetheless, and the players compete wholeheartedly, using any new knowledge of the game they may acquire.

Anagnostis and Mitchell were player-coaches for the Lugano Seagulls, who made it all the way to the National Championship only to lose to the Zurich Renjados 8-0.

"The players ranged from the age of 15 to 42," said Anagnostis. "They take the game seriously and are anxious to learn," he added.

Anagnostis said that communication wasn't a problem. "Most players knew four languages or so and could speak them," said Anagnostis, "So it's easy to be understood."

Anagnostis said he enjoyed the trip. The members of the team were constantly making sure he and Mitchell were comfortable and taken care of. "The guys were great; they treated me like it was a big deal for me to be there," said Anagnostis.

Amid the Walter Payton posters and the N.Y. Giants caps, the dream for most of these players is to come to America and see how football is played here. When an American with football experience comes to their homeland, they realize the potential they have to learn more about playing the game, and it is a treasured one.

Any type of shirt, cap, or other article which contains the logo of a professional or college team is snatched up as soon as it's seen by the European football players. They know the great football players' names and are fans of the game.

Anagnostis said he really enjoyed playing with as well as teaching the European players and would definitely go do it again.

Scots lose to Samford

by Brett 'Prep' Stanley

Samford had a happy Homecoming after dropping the bomb on the Scots 72-10. Samford had 392 yards rushing and 306 yards passing compared to the Scots' 55 yards rushing and 235 yards passing.

The Scots accomplished their points by a 33-yard field goal by Henry Marambo and a touchdown pass from Joe Anagnostis to Rene Couto.

Couto pulled in four receptions for 77 yards while Ricky Miller grabbed four for 82 yards.

The coach said the reason the Scots were beaten so badly was because the team was "thoroughly outmatched." He further said that "they had a Division I All-American quarterback, and every time they got the ball they scored."

Soccer team finishes '87 season

by Barbara Bolt

The Maryville College Soccer Scots captured two victories to close their winning season, finishing 11-6 for the year.

On Homecoming, the Scots defeated Eastern Mennonite. Mike Rethwilm scored the only goal during the first half after several attempts had been made by the Scots.

The second half brought goals by Randy Evans and Matt Granstrand and several injuries for both teams. Trond Skogseth made the final goal for the Scots late in the game, bringing the score to 4-0.

The Scots' last game for the season was against Tennessee Tech.

After scoring on a penalty kick by senior Nick Busko, the Scots dominated the playing field with Rethwilm on an assist by Granstrand netting goal number two.

Granstrand, Evans, Be Mona, and Mark Smelser all made goals for the Scots. Senior Walter Walsh also had a penalty kick against Tech. Rethwilm had two additional goals late in the game, bringing the final score to Maryville College 9, Tennessee Tech 0.

Career Planning and Placement and the Maryville College Alumni Association are beginning a series of career seminars which will enable MC students to meet with alumni in an informal setting, to get to know them better, and to gain some personal insight into their career fields.

Careers in marketing and careers with the airlines: David Conklin, MC '66, district marketing manager, Delta Airlines, will meet with all interested students to discuss career opportunities in these fields. He will also discuss the marketing strategies used by Delta. Monday, Nov. 16, 2:00 to 3:15, Thaw Hall 216.

Careers in counseling and psychology: Diane Humphries-Barlow, MC '70, MSW '73, is in private practice in Knoxville and has worked at Helen Ross McNabb and Peninsula Hospital. Monday, Nov. 23, 7:00 pm, Crawford House.

TVA has a work/learn position in their Student Training and Employment Program (STEP) for an MC student to do legal research. You must be a full-time student and not be a relative of a TVA employee. You would be able to work a maximum of 20 hours per week during school and full time when school is not in session. Pay would range between $5.65 and $6.75 per hour. To apply, you must submit a TVA application (available in CPP) and a transcript.

(OCR) -- Fast food, big sales. The sixth McDonald's franchise on a college campus has opened in the Arizona State U. Memorial Union. The outlet seats 200 and is expected to reach between $1 and $1.5 million in annual sales. ASU will receive 8.5 percent of annual sales.

(OCR) -- Sororitus Homophobus. Yale's chapter of the Kappa Alpha Theta sorority found itself in an unenlightened position, and unhappy about it: A clause in the campus charter's standards, somebody discovered, states that homosexual activity is illegal and that sorority members suspected of it should be asked to quit. It turns out that all 100 chapters nationwide have the same standard. Yale chapter members say they were shocked, and are writing to the national organization in protest. It also turns out there is no law against consensual homosexuality in Connecticut.

(OCR) -- Terrorist tactics earn jail terms. Twelve U. of Texas-Austin activists have received three-to six-month jail terms for taking over the UT president's office as part of an anti-apartheid protest a year ago. County Judge Leslie Taylor also ordered the protesters to pay fines (up to $200) and court costs.

(OCR) -- Alcohol is the drug of choice on the U. of Kentucky campus, according to a survey conducted last spring. Roughly 87 percent of UK students have tried alcohol. The survey, which has three percent margin of error, reported 15 percent of the drinkers averaged one drink per day; five percent averaged eight drinks or more per day. More than 40 percent of UK students said they'd tried marijuana. Most disturbing news: of the students who said they used alcohol, two-thirds reported that -- at least half the time -- they combined alcohol with marijuana.

(OCR) -- Army ROTC recruiting is not allowed during registration at the U. of Oklahoma. The school previously granted permission to set up a table to promote its freshman military science course, but later revoked permission, saying that because of space limitations, tables weren't allowed in the registration hall.

(OCR) -- College Bowl -- the series that aired on network TV in the 1960s and on radio and TV specials in the '70s and early '80s -- returns on the Disney Channel this fall. ## QC group discusses 3 topics on Nov. 2

by Marianne Rucker

The Quality Circle (QC), discussed day care, the lounge in Anderson, and shrubbery on November 2.

What is Quality Circle? It's a small group of people from the same work area who meet on a regular basis to identify, analyze, and solve quality and other problems in their area.

The QC concept was originated in the 1960's by business and industry. Bruce Guillaume started MC's first group in 1984.

QC has spent almost a year researching the possibility of a day care center at MC. In February, the group met with Sara Byrd, head of the governor's Day Care Task Force.

Laura Case, office manager of Student Affairs, said, "It would be extremely expensive, and the college doesn't have the money to start one up at this time."

According to Linda Moore, office manager for Admissions, "There really aren't that many people who would benefit. There aren't that many with small children." She added that a facility and insurance would be too costly.

The lounge in Anderson is not being used because it's unpleasant and dirty. Moore said, "We would like to have a cheery place to go for breaks."

A letter will be sent to faculty and staff requesting donations to the lounge fund. Plans are to paint the walls, remove the old couch, and add a table and chairs.

There has been a problem with overgrowth of shrubbery near the main entrance to the college. Ann Morgan said, "Donna Davis has called the city, and her hands are tied." At Morgan's suggestion, a call will be made to the Daily Times' Action Line.

Last Monday's meeting was opened by Marlene Hodge, chairperson. Five members were present.

The QC meets weekly in Fayerweather.

Dr. Richard Rose frankly discussed AIDS and other sexually transmitted diseases during CIV, November 19

'Most important CIV' deals with AIDS issue

by Andi Bristol

"You don't get AIDS by sitting next to someone -- you get AIDS by having sex," said Dr. Richard Rose during the CIV on AIDS and other sexually transmitted diseases (STD), November 19.

As Dr. David Cartlidge introduced Rose, he said, "In terms of your personal life, this could be the most important CIV you come to."

Rose, in his address, described and showed slides of the symptoms and consequences of herpes, syphilis, chlamydia, and gonorrhea, but his main focus was on the issue of AIDS.

AIDS usually manifests itself in one or more of the following ways:

infection of the brain which leads to dementia, wasting disease resulting in severe weight loss, cancer, or respiratory infections.

These patients are usually given about six months to live, but with the new drug, AZT, Rose said, their life can be prolonged 12 to 18 months.

"Safe sex is safer -- not safe," Rose said. "Spermicidal jelly and condoms both prevent AIDS, but if you can get pregnant, as five percent do, you can also get AIDS."

When asked how one could change people's attitudes towards the disease, Rose said, "You could try dying on a cross, but it wouldn't work. I don't mean that facetiously; it's difficult

'Tis the season: MC welcomes Christmas

by Jennifer C. Worth

It's beginning to look a lot like Christmas, as Meredith Willson wrote over 30 years ago. With the campus tree lit and, ready or not, finals approaching, MC has entered the Christmas season.

This time of year means different things to different people but something good to almost everyone.

Family is an important part of any holiday, especially Christmas. Kathy Fox said her favorite thing about Christmastime is "getting to see all my family together at one time." Family also heads Andi Bristol's list, as it does that of Lisa Harvey Lingenfelter, who described her favorite part of Christmas as "family and togetherness."

Christmas also provides aesthetic pleasures: sights, sounds, flavors, and even smells that earmark this season.

Anne Marcum named "Christmas music" as one of her favorite parts of Christmas. Music is also an important facet of the season for Dr. David Cartlidge, chairman of the department of religion and philosophy; he said, "The music of the Christmas season is so rich."

The first signs of the season are the decorations, from glass and plastic to freshly picked evergreens. Denise Franklin said that Christmas trees are her favorite.

Nancy Phillips also enjoys the Christmas tree, especially after the pre-Christmas bustle has calmed; she said, "My mom and I like to sit and relax on Christmas night, and we look at the tree." Marcum also said that to know how to change people's minds on a larger scale due to prejudices you have to deal with."

With the projected 300,000 cases of AIDS by 1991, America will have to learn how to deal with AIDS.

she enjoys "decorating the house."

Following on the heels of the department-store garland and decorations are the ever-present fruitcakes. Many delectable foods -- from turkey to eggnog -- fill the Christmas season. After all, it was "visions of sugar-plums" that danced through the heads of sleeping children in Clement Clarke Moore's "A Visit from St. Nicholas."

Food is an important Yuletide pleasure to Bristol. Barbara Bolt said her favorite part of the Christmas season is "all that wonderful food that is made around Christmastime, like turkey, ham, Christmas cookies. . . ." When asked his favorite thing about Christmastime, Cartlidge exclaimed, "Cookies!"

Hand in hand with Christmas flavors go Christmas aromas: warm cookies, fresh evergreens, and crisp bayberry. Sabine Hutchison said, "I love the smells of Christmas."

To MC students -- and students nationwide -- Christmas also means relaxation and a time to retreat from the demands of schoolwork. That retreat may be spent in a frenetic whirl of social events (Christmas parties, carolling, open houses, and other activities abound in December), or it may consist of a clichéd but cozy snuggle in front of a fireplace with a good book.

However it is spent,

Independent interims: Planning, hard work

by Barbara Bolt

Interim registration has come and gone, and nothing offered caught your eye. Or maybe there is something you do well or would like to try. Either way, you need an interim credit. If any one of these categories fits your situation, then an independent interim could be the solution.

Contrary to a popular belief on campus, independent interims are not an easy way out for interim credits, especially if one is seeking off-campus experiential credit. Most projects require a tremendous amount of planning and cooperation between the student, the off-campus advisor, and the on-campus advisor.

The Interim Committee has specific criteria that each type of interim must meet. For example, an off-campus experiential interim requires, among other things, a change of living environment for a week or more. The criteria are set out in a step-by-step process that involves tentative proposals and budgets, signed statements, and final evaluation sheets.

Getting an independent interim off the ground is the hardest step. This involves a synopsis of the interim, including dates, times, and places; securing both advisors; and choosing reading and research material. Deciding on the method of evaluation also occurs at this time. These steps must be completed during the spring term of the year preceding the project.

The second step is the final proposal, the budget, and the proper signatures that are turned in during the fall semester. Both the on-campus and off-campus advisors have to agree upon the evaluation methods

Echo's purpose discussed

The Echo serves the MC Community. Our goal is to print information that is interesting to members of the campus and news that is important for them to know.

We always welcome suggestions, story ideas, and written material from students, faculty, and staff members. This input is valuable, for it not only makes our job easier, but it also lets us appeal to a wider section of the campus than our relatively small writing staff will permit.

However, the Echo cannot always print everything we receive. If we feel a piece is not timely, newsworthy, nor conforming to the standards of journalism, we can't print it, just as we can't print anonymous material.

The Echo staff serves the campus community as a whole, and therefore cannot be subject to individual faulty members', administrators', or students' wishes. Information which seems vital to you may not be of interest or significance to the campus in general.

One of the beauties of freedom of the press is that, if you disagree with this or any other Echo policy, you can write a column or a letter to the editor expressing that view and explaining your position. Sometimes objectivity, which is the basis of most journalism, is best achieved, not by an exclusion of all opinion, but by a balance of varied opinions.

Remember that the Echo is here for you, and for the dozens of others in the campus community who aren't even bothering to read these words. If you want something done differently, let us know. If you have a problem with or applause for any other department, organization, or event, we can communicate it.

Just remember, the Echo must not, in the interest of fairness, become anyone's personal forum.

Editor's notes:

"Happy, indeed, are they through whose souls course the genial currents of ancient tradition, who with natural and non-rational joy can stoop to drink of the springs of wonder, under the tree and beside the Manger; for they are precisely those who enter abundantly into the kingdom of Christmas and come to know and love the human beauties and holy mysteries thereof."

What William Muir Auld, in this portion of his introduction to Christmas Traditions, is wordily saying is that this holiday can be enjoyed on various levels, by Christians and by non-Christians.

Christmas is at heart a celebration of giving. It doesn't matter whether you believe that the basic gift was that of God's son to humanity, that of the ever-burning Hanukkah oil, or that of one loving person to another.

Instead of criticizing in one way or the other, people should allow themselves to get caught up in the spirit of the season, and enjoy it according their own faiths and convictions.

'Do your own thing' a forgotten principle of MC's young people?

by Nancy Oberholtzer

Maryville College students are starting to worry me. This is my fourth year on campus, and I have noticed an increasing trend towards neo-fascism. I admit, as a CE student, I might be a little more tolerant than all of you 18-and 19-year olds who know everything and are ready to take control of the world NOW.

I admit, when I was fresh out of high school, I certainly had it all figured out. There was a difference, though. At that time, it was fashionable to be relaxed and tolerant. Does the phrase "do your own thing" sound familiar to anybody?

Anyway, if there is one thing MC students are not, it is tolerant. I also think they (for the most part) would rather send people to the salt mines before letting them do their own thing. The way some students seem to be thinking, they are the only ones capable of determining what is an acceptable "own thing" for one to be doing.

This observation is not unfounded. For example, this past semester, I heard a student in class argue that everybody who's on welfare is lazy and looking for a free ride. He didn't say the system had flaws and needed work; he thought it should be abolished -- completely. He was quite serious, too. He just couldn't imagine a person that just was not able to support him. This student felt that since everyone in America had the same access to free public education, everyone should be able to command some sort of skill.

He elaborated by pointing out that he grew up in a public school, and he was able to go to college to further himself. He felt that he was not privileged in any way by being admitted to MC. If there was someone who wanted to attend college but wasn't well educated enough, that person should go to the neighborhood library and learn everything he needed to know to get into college. If a person refused to take this opportunity, and ended up on welfare, it's that person's own fault, and we'd be better off just letting this person die of exposure and starvation, because he has nothing of value to contribute to our society, anyway.

Correct me if I'm wrong, but I interpret that to mean that this student

Reporters need campus cooperation

by Andi Bristol

Being a reporter for the Highland Echo isn't always easy. Believe it or not, there are some faculty, staff, and administrators who do not cooperate fully with our student publication.

The Echo not only provides the campus with news and information but is also a forum for students to express grievances or opinions.

Members of the campus community who give reporters information that is "strictly off the record," want editing rights over articles, or try to penalize students for expressing their opinions only make the reporter's job difficult.

The administration seems to want only upbeat articles to appear in the Echo, but I have news for them -- the news, even on this lovely campus, is not always good or "upbeat." A campus newspaper should address not only those things which are good, but also try to change those things which are bad.

In order for the Echo to perform its function in the campus community, the reporters must be allowed the same rights as all other reporters -- to search out the news and report it in an unbiased, honest fashion.

To do this, they must have the cooperation of the faculty, staff, and administration of the college.

the weeks of Christmas break are deeply appreciated by students and professors alike. Donna Sue Hadden and Lynn King agreed that the vacation was a large part of their enjoyment of Christmas.

Frank Bradley, theatre director and instructor of English, gets a break of a different kind. Being Baha'i, Bradley and his wife do not officially celebrate Christmas. One way they enjoy the season is the time they get to spend with each other while their toddler daughter, Rachel, visits her grandparents.

At the heart of Christmas for most people in the Western world is the religious meaning beneath the customs and celebrations. Cartlidge pointed out this facet of the holiday, as did Julie Mullaney, who said that the spirit of the season exists "year-round, since the holiday has religious significance."

Darrell Franklin also emphasized the non-secular side of Christmas, saying that he enjoys "the non-commercial worship of a religious holiday."

The "non-commercial" aspect is the trickiest to achieve, since Christmastime is the biggest sales season for retailers, who capitalize on the opportunity. One way they do so is moving the opening of the Christmas season further up in the calendar each year; this fall, some stores had Yuletide wares on the shelves before Halloween. Bolt said of this tendency, "I think that's ridiculous."

In fact, most people feel that the Christmas season begins at Thanksgiving; some, such as Becky Lindsey, Bolt, and Marcum, place the beginning of the season in December.

The basis for stores' big Christmastime business is the spirit of giving, which has given rise in this country to our jolly, gift-giving Santa and to the custom of exchanging presents. This aspect of Christmas is for many a highlight of the season. Mullaney's favorite part of Christmas is, she said, "picking out gifts for people."

Once selected and wrapped, the gifts are a visual reminder of Christmas' generous side; Lindsey said she loves to see "the presents under the Christmas tree."

Shopping for those gifts can be frenetic, as the crowds in area malls and stores can attest. Although many at MC haven't begun or have just begun their shopping, a few have already made large dents in their Christmas lists. Fox, for instance, estimated that she has "already bought three-fourths of my Christmas presents."

advocates the death penalty for stupidity.

Another example of this growing cult of neo-fascism is the answer a majority of students in a human resources class gave on an exam. The case was about some officers in the Army who were having a hard time motivating the troops in exercises. The solution they arrived at was to use live ammunition during these exercises. They figured, roughly, about 25 or so out of every 5,000 soldiers would be killed, but that it would motivate the hell out of them.

Real war is bad enough, but these officers decided to kill soldiers in exercises just to motivate them! According to the students in this class, that was a perfectly acceptable solution. The 25 or so that got killed were probably not doing their jobs anyway, and it was no loss to get rid of them.

What is it with you guys? We're talking about human lives here, and you're willing to kill off those you judge inferior. Not mass murderers, not criminals who set little children on fire, just some poor guy who isn't up to your standards. More support for the death penalty for stupidity, it seems to me.

I don't even want to think about what happened in an ethics class, but I believe it's necessary to prove my point. A visiting attorney suggested that we open up Acme Body Parts Store. (That's human body parts, not automobile.) The attorney tried to point out that those who were very poor (and stupid) would sell their parts they might need, just because the money looked good to them. This would create a black market, undoubtedly, and therefore back alley surgery would kill many people that were too stupid to see the risk.

Of course, the rich could always afford any parts they needed no matter what the cost. That would mean that poor people would die, because the rich would have first claim on all the parts. Can you guess what this class said? It sounded fine to them. If poor people were stupid enough to sell their parts for whatever reason, too bad for them. The rich deserved to have the parts, anyway. After all, they were smart enough to be rich. Here we go again, the death penalty for stupidity.

Lighten up! Not everyone is as intelligent or privileged as you are. Just by virtue of your position in our society, you will be called upon to help those less fortunate than yourselves. I hope by the time you are out in the "real world" you will have decided to be more tolerant.

I hope you will accept your responsibility gracefully, and reach out a hand to those who ask, instead of sentencing them to death.

by this point also.

Once the interim is complete, the student must give a synopsis of the project to the on-campus advisor and/or a presentation to interested members of the college community.

The Interim Committee is very helpful in trying to arrange the interims, but the majority of the planning is the student's responsibility.

Because some opportunities present themselves at short notice, the committee realizes that the year-in-advance timetable cannot always be adhered to.

The independent interim program is one of the best ways Maryville College has to offer to teach the liberal arts philosophy of flexibility and adaptation.

The best advice that could be given to those considering an independent interim is: plan the project to the last detail, but be flexible enough so that if changes must be made, the whole project is not lost.

Band to give concert

by Dan Fox

The Maryville College Highlander Band will give a Christmas concert on Friday, December 4, at 8:15 p.m. in the FAC Music Hall.

Directed by Rick Carl, the band will play some music that they hope will interest the college and community, such as "Stille Nacht (Silent Night)," "C'est Noël" and "Do Go Gentle into that Good Night."

Also on the agenda are some old favorites: "Greensleeves," "Jesu, Joy of Man's Desiring," "Sleigh Ride," and "Deck the Halls."

This will be Carl's first official concert as director of the Highlander Band, and the band feels confident that it will be a good one. Carl has been working long practice hours with the band, expecting nothing but the best.

After the performance, there will be a reception in Pearsons.

King's It is here, and it's a must-read

by Julie Mullancy

If you've been dying for a good horror novel, It could be what you've been waiting for. Yes, Stephen King, who gave us plenty of reasons to shiver with his numerous other novels -- The Shining, The Dead Zone, and Cujo, to name a few -- has given us another one (to be read only with the lights on).

It is a long story -- 1090 pages. After the first one, you won't be able to put it down. It begins with the murder of a young boy near a sewer grate, and, at first glance, it appears to be just another monster-in-the-sewer-under-the-city deal, complete with voices coming out of the kitchen sink. The cover illustration aids in this deception -- it shows a greenish, reptilian hand reaching out of a grate in the pavement.

Don't let this fool you. Derry, Maine, is not just another city with a sewer monster. It is a town which has grown up around and become infiltrated by unspeakable evil.

It, for that matter, is not just another sewer monster. It doesn't always stay underground. It kills people -- mostly children -- and it can change shape. Perhaps, it's most sinister guise is Pennywise the Clown.

Pennywise makes appearances throughout the novel, tormenting the people who have vowed to kill it. In his wake, he leaves festively colored balloons with cheery messages, such as, "I killed Barbara Starrett!" and "Asthma medicine causes lung cancer." Obviously, this Pennywise fellow is no Clarabell.

It is not an ordinary horror book. It is the story of a strong bond of friendship and love among a group of childhood friends. The characters are ordinary people with real human thoughts and emotions. This alone makes It worth reading, but when combined with the fright, it makes It a must-read!

As Is: Too hot to handle?

by Marianne Rucker

Auditions for As Is, the next Lab Theater production, were held on November 19. One person showed up.

Joe Chamberlain, the play's director, said, "For reasons unknown to us, the auditions were not attended sufficiently to cast the show in the minimum number of eight people."

He said that three others were scheduled to audition but had to work.

"The play's topic is important," said Chamberlain, "because it's a fight against homophobia. It's exposure to other lifestyles."

As Is is the story of Rich, a homosexual who has contracted AIDS; his lover, Saul; and the effect of the disease on their relationship and that of their friends and families.

The dialogue is explicit, as is some of the behavior.

"The play is becoming quickly dated. AIDS is no longer just the 'gay plague.' This is the time to do the play," said Chamberlain.

"If the response [to the audition] has anything to do with the subject matter, i.e., AIDS and homosexuality, that's all the more reason to do this play," he said.

He added, "What this play talks about is people."

He planned to "actively seek people who are interested" and to reschedule auditions.

Five days later, Chamberlain said that he decided to "scrap the project."

He said that he's already invested 50 dollars of his own money on scripts and that he is "tired of the lethargy on campus."

"I stumbled across As Is in my production course. I thought it would be a good vehicle to raise AIDS awareness," he said.

"I think the basic problem here is that the campus is fragmented. There's not a sense of community," he said.

He does not think that it is as much a matter of apathy, but "what we're seeing here is a result of the passive nature of television."

Frank Bradley, theater director, was also disappointed by the audition turnout. "Here was a perfect example for the students to become involved with an activity that is both challenging and productive," he said.

"All over the country this play has been performed again and again and again. I don't think it's that controversial," he said.

He said that the turnout for auditions for As Is "indicates a lack of interest" and "the passivity and inactivity of the students."

Lilley exhibits his Concerns in gallery

by Jimmy Simerly

The art of senior Chris Lilley will be featured in the FAC gallery this month. The title for the exhibit is Concerns.

When asked about the subject matter of his display, Lilley responded that it will contain works relating with some of the experiences he has had at school. These experiences, according to Lilley, have made him more aware of the environmental issues that affect us all.

For example, Lilley's exhibit will contain works about world concerns like famine and nuclear war.

By addressing these and other concerns in his exhibit, Lilley hopes to make his viewers give more thought to the use of our planet and its resources. He also would like his audience to be more aware of the abuses and manipulations of people in other parts of the world.

In displaying such thought-provoking works of art, Lilley hopes his audience will learn something. He said he wanted his art to "spark some type of interest -- be it positive or negative."

Included in Lilley's exhibit will be a variety of media. There will be drawings, paintings, sculptures, and examples of printmaking. Also included will be works done in mixed-media fashion.

Playmakers team in creative efforts

by Pam Gunter

Maybe you have heard of the Playmakers, but do you know who and what they are? Many people think all of the people involved in the fall and spring productions are Playmakers. Wrong.

Playmakers, now in its eleventh year, was founded by Sharon Crane because of artistic differences in the theatre department. It is a theatrical organization that offers alternative acting experiences, other than main stage. These alternatives include "sidewalk" skits, workshops, and self-direction, in which one of the members directs a production.

"Playmakers is more of an open type of learning experience where we are able to work together more," said senior Laura Starky.

Working together seems to be the important aspect separating Playmakers from the main stage, as Jon Allison explained: "It's not a question of who's got the lead -- every part is equal. When you don't have a lead, people work together more."

Each May, open auditions are held to fill positions vacated by graduating or non-returning members. Starky emphasized that the decisions made at auditions are not based solely on talent "but it is a balance of several factors." Talent is combined with the ability to work well with others and the ability to make the commitment.

The company, which usually maintains 8-12 members, has 11 members this season. Those 11 are Leah Mueller, Donna Sue Hadden, Liz Prior, Jeff Wallace, Laura Starky, Ellen Foreman, Heather Farrar, Jonathan Allison, Steve Herbert, Dan Reynolds, and Jonathan Yarboro.

Playmakers usually performs three or four different works at various times during the year, and free shows are presented once each semester for students.

Line up for the good food at Palace's lunchtime buffet

by Marianne Rucker

There's a great lunchtime buffet at the Golden Palace Restaurant in Alcoa.

The atmosphere is relaxed, hospitality abounds, and you can't beat the prices -- $3.25 for all you can eat.

With some exceptions, the offerings change from day to day, depending on the chef's mood. Regulars include beef with broccoli, hot and sour soup, fried rice, and egg rolls.

On the day that we decided to indulge, besides the above, we had eight-treasure chicken, sweet and sour chicken, hot-plate chicken, and beef with green pepper.

Everything was delicious. The ingredients were fresh, and the food was hot.

The soups were thick and hearty, and crispy Chinese noodles added to the enjoyment.

The beef was tender, lean and bountiful. The beef with broccoli contained a proportioned amount of fresh broccoli, carrots, and onions.

The chicken in the sweet and sour chicken was lightly batter-fried and real -- not compressed.

There are a few criticisms: the sauces of the eight-treasure chicken and the beef with the green pepper tasted exactly the same; the only ingredient inside the egg rolls was cabbage; the chicken wings in the hot plate chicken were fatty and heavily breaded, though nice and spicy.

Even though it was "serve yourself," the waitress was attentive, and the hostess stopped by the table to see if everything was okay.

If buffet is not your style, there is a regular luncheon menu with prices ranging from $2.95 to $4.70. Most entrees include egg roll, soup, and rice.

Golden Palace is located on Telford Street across from Midland Shopping Center. Lunch is served from 11:00 a.m. to 3:00 p.m.

Attraction: tense with message

by Ellen Foreman

"Are you?"
"Am I what?"
"Discreet."
"Yes. I'm discreet."
"So am I."

Thus begins the horror story of what Dan Gallagher (played by Michael Douglas) sees as a harmless one-night grope.

From the dialogue above and the rather intense eye and libido contact that go with it, one might assume that the only thing potentially "fatal" in Fatal Attraction would be an over-zealous sex scene. Not so.

Glenn Close, whom the American public is accustomed to seeing in wholesome, conservative roles, does a bang-up job in her role as Alex, Dan's lover.

Alex is hardly the Pollyanna type -- she seduces Dan, and when he leaves her to return to his normal life, she becomes at first obsessive and then progressively psychotic.

This character may not fit Close's image, but she proves herself quite a capable actress by pulling it off. Alex doesn't even need to speak to evoke a response -- the warped, mad look in her eyes is enough to cause shivers of horror.

Dan is a good balance for the movie: he is a typical, yuppie-ish married man with a good wife, an adorable child, and a dog. His flippancy toward his extramarital affair makes it all the more significant that he can't get rid of his attachment (Alex).

Douglas' complete portrayal of Dan leads the viewer through a spectrum of emotions -- contempt, pity, paranoia, fear, and, finally, relief.

The film itself can be described with one word: tense.

From the "morning after" to the final credits, the audience is caught up in relentless suspense that culminates in a horrifying slaughter scene.

The intensity of the film, the quality of the acting, and the excellent photography all combine to make Fatal Attraction a very entertaining and thought-provoking movie.

(OCR) -- Now is the time for vending-machine condom sales on Georgia campuses. The idea was much discussed at the U. of Georgia, among others, after a young U. of North Carolina grad proposed installing "very generic, very clinical-looking" 50-cent machines in dormitories at state schools. But officials turned him down in the end. "In this particular location, there would be a lot of resistance to that idea on the part of parents or legislators or whoever . . .," said a UG health service official. Contraceptives are dispensed at the health service clinic.

MC day care project put on hold, says quality circle

by Nancy Oberholtzer

It looks as though Maryville College won't be opening a day care center in the near future. According to Laura Case, office manager of Student Affairs, the funding just is not available.

Case is co-chairperson of the Essential Support Personnel Quality Circle. This is a group of secretaries who meet every week to discuss ideas, problems, and events that affect their position on campus.

According to Case, during a "brainstorm session" at a meeting in February 1987, the subject of a campus day care center was brought up. After some discussion, the group decided to get approval to pursue the idea. Case said they received permission from Dr. Richard Ferrin, and went to work on the project on March 9.

The first thought was that there were several unused structures on campus that could be utilized as a day care. It seemed as though it would be fairly simple and inexpensive to renovate one of these buildings, such as Carnegie or Crawford House.

After some research, however, it became apparent that renovating an existing structure to meet state requirements would cost more than building a new facility.

According to Case, the quality circle also conducted surveys on campus and discovered an interest in child development. There were many students interested in work-study jobs involving the prospective day care.

Although the quality circle originally felt an MC day care would be only for faculty, staff, and students, they soon realized that it would need to be open to the general public.

The day care had always been intended to be a money-making operation, and there did not seem to be enough on-campus business to generate the needed income. That would mean that outside competition would be a major factor.

Faculty member Alicia Berry looked at the situation from a business standpoint. Berry said, "The idea of a day care on campus is extremely attractive, especially to those of us with young children. However, if one considers it realistically, it is clearly economically infeasible for the college to subsidize a program of such limited usefulness to the community as a whole. If I look at it objectively, there are many college-sponsored projects that should take priority."

Even if the funds could be found to develop an MC day care center, and that is not very likely at this time, it seems as though it would not be a profitable venture.

If it is not for profit, then it is a benefit. Due to policy guidelines governing quality circles nationwide, such groups are not allowed to

Need help? Tutoring open to all

by Jimmy Simerly

The tutoring program at Maryville College is alive and well and ready for use by any student who needs it. The program is divided into two segments, one for international students and one for American students.

The program for international students was conceived by and is directed by Dr. Young-Bae Kim, professor of political science. Kim said that a student should approach him if he or she feels that a tutor is needed in a particular subject area. Kim will talk with the appropriate instructor, who will recommend a well-qualified student to act as tutor.

Kim recommended that a tutor be someone who is doing well in the class. However, if this is not possible, a student who has already taken the particular class is sometimes available.

According to Kim, about one-third of the international students presently utilize the tutoring program. There is, however, a tendency for the same students to be tutored every year.

Because of varying cultural backgrounds, some international students will not say anything when they need tutoring. However, Kim urges both faculty and students to cooperate to continue this successful program.

According to the Office of Student Affairs, American students who wish to have tutors should contact Kandis Schram.

Frank Fiore joined the MC staff as the head of Student Programming at the beginning of the year

Heather Ferrar

Frank Fiore sets goals for SP

by Julie Mullaney

Determined. This is the word which probably best describes Frank Fiore, new head of Student Programming.

"At first, he looks like a student," said Kayoko Nagakura. This is true -- and he knows what a Maryville College student looks like. Fiore graduated from MC with the class of '83. During his time as a student Fiore was actively involved in "just about everything on campus," including Student Programming.

After graduating, Fiore served in the U.S. Army for three and a half years, and then he retired. He came back to the area this spring.

When asked why he decided to return to MC, Fiore replied, "MC is where I am happiest." After a short pause for thought, he added, "I don't have to work because of my disability. If I work, I want to work somewhere I care about. The College needed somebody ... I figured I'd just give it a shot."

Fiore's plans for Student Programming are "to reach out to more students." He wants to see "... the students get involved in their own enjoyment -- their own environment."

He is determined to do this "because," he said, "the thing you remember most about college isn't your classes."

Fiore is easy to talk to and seems willing to listen. These qualities are important, since he works directly with the students.

Nagakura said Fiore is "... very helpful. At Homecoming, the International Club sold cookies. He helped to arrange everything."

Jimmy Simerly also said that he is helpful. Simerly, another member of the International Club, said, "When we had the Homecoming Parade ... he told us where to get the truck and everything."

Fiore seems to have been well received by the students. Now that he is settled in, he is determined to help the students get things done. He says that by working with Student Programming, students can learn to be more "creative individuals."

He added, "I would feel that we failed as an organization if we failed at that." He certainly does not seem ready to let that happen.

Scots Club boosts athletics, aims at MC excellence

by Marianne Rucker

"Rebuilding a tradition of excellence in Athletics" is the motto of the MC Scots Club (SC).

This athletics booster organization originated in 1984 under Dr. Wayne Anderson, then MC president.

Its purpose, according to Randy Lambert, MC's director of athletics, is "to support the inter-collegiate athletics program above and beyond what is budgeted for them."

"It started with a mass mailing to interested people in the area and to the alumni," said Lambert. "There was a tremendous response. The first year we raised $19,000," he added.

"So far this year we have close to 75 members and have raised $13,000," he said.

Club membership benefits are based on contributions. Benefits include tickets to all athletic contests, parking and seating privileges, social events, and more.

One of SC's activities is adopting and funding projects.

This year the SC was responsible for renovating the PE building's office area, creating a new entrance, and developing the Honaker Room and the Wall of Fame.

"Last year's project was the outfield fence and backstop," said Lambert. "Every year they put money into the athletic fields, and they're continuing to develop the soccer field," he added.

Another yearly project is the letter awards system. "We're not giving athletic scholarships. At least we can give [the athletes] some kind of recognition," he said.

"To me, it's the best thing that's happened to MC's athletics. It's provided some of the extras -- the icing on the cake -- that you can't provide with the normal operating budget," he said.

Other members echo Lambert's enthusiasm about the SC.

Business Manager Donna Davis and her husband, Alan, have been members since the beginning. She said the SC "gives us an opportunity to feel involved."

"Athletics is expensive, but at small schools you don't have the ticket revenues that you have at large schools. UT athletics helps support the whole school," she said.

The Davises go to the games and try to take a couple of road trips a year. The purpose of the SC, according to Davis, is "not just financial support but moral support as well."

SC member Ellie Gilmore, director of Development and Alumni Relations, said she's "happy to see that it's growing."

Bob Navratil, MC graduate and local attorney, said the SC "provides funds that will strengthen the athletic program at the college."

An active member, Navratil "spots" for Skeeter Shields, Maryville's mayor and the games' announcer.

Joe Dawson, president of the SC, played football for MC and graduated in 1969. He is administrator of Blount Memorial Hospital.

"My effort has been to try to strengthen the link between the college and the SC," he said. "We're trying to get better support from the college for the athletic department," he added.

Sports Commentary: Coaches must win to keep job

by Brett "Prep" Stanley

Since the announcement earlier this month that Earle Bruce, head football coach at Ohio State University, will be fired at the end of this season, there has been a lot of talk around campus about the unfairness of firing a coach because his team isn't winning.

Actually, the OSU coach was winning, but he wasn't winning enough to take his team to one of the post-season bowl games. That failure means a loss of money for the school from a nationally televised bowl appearance and the loss of the coach's job.

There has been nothing in the media to suggest that the coach was fired for any other reason. Bruce has a winning record at OSU, his players are well-disciplined, and his good sportmanship and fair play have never been questioned.

If he had been fired for shortcomings in one these areas, it would be easy to accept his being fired. After all, a coach is expected to be good at his job, and his players are expected to develop into men of character.

Unfortunately, the modern-day coach at a major college takes the job knowing that he will be fired if he doesn't produce a winner and, in some cases, a winner that goes to a bowl game.

Last season Bruce took OSU to the Cotton Bowl and won. This year three consecutive losses got him fired, and Penn State coach Joe Paterno called the firing "a sad commentary for the coaching profession." "Win -- or get fired" seems to be the rule.

How does this emphasis on winning affect the coach? Well, for one thing, he may resort to "playing dirty" in order to become a winner and save his job.

We at Maryville are fortunate that our coaches can go about the job of teaching sports and building character without feeling that they must win games in order to keep their jobs.

What a loss of prestige and dignity it would be if the goal at Maryville were like that at some other schools which want "to build the school the football team could be proud of."

Day Care from p. 6

discuss benefits.

Case said, "We went into it as a money-raising project. When we found out it couldn't be a money raiser, we, as a quality circle, decided not to pursue it."

Faculty member Scott Brunger expressed a new idea. He said, "The college is now considering intergenerational programs. One of the models that has been tried is putting retirement centers next to day cares. A retirement center is currently being considered in the woods past Morningside. Why not a day care while you're at it?"

The day care issue is a complex one, and it will not be resolved quickly.

The party begins.

I can drive when I drink.

I can drive when I drink.

After 4 drinks.

I can drive when I drink.

After 5 drinks.

I can drive when I drink.

The more you drink, the more coordination you lose. That's a fact, plain and simple.

It's also a fact that 12 ounces of beer, 5 ounces of wine and 1 1/4 ounces of spirits all have the same alcohol content. And consumed in excess, all can affect you. Still, people drink too much and then go out and expect to handle a car.

When you drink too much, you can't handle a car. You can't even handle a pen.

Also, the 1988 seniors might want to contact MC alumni in their area of interest to see about developing contacts for future job opportunities. These graduates will be a wonderful resource for you. Perhaps they can be your ticket into the "hidden job market."

ANNOUNCEMENTS

7:00 to 8:00 p.m., Tuesday, December 8: ROOMMATE GAME in Theater

ALL EMERGENCY LOANS through the Financial Aid Office are due IN FULL no later than 5:00 p.m., Tuesday, December 8. Students who will have a problem meeting this deadline should see Annette or Dan in the Financial Aid Office as soon as possible. Students who fail to pay their loans without notifying the Financial Aid Office will have their grades, transcripts, and/or diplomas held.

Come to the Bookstore and register to win $200 worth of Maryville College memorabilia. The deadline for registration is December 14 at 4:00. The drawing will take place on December 15th at 1:00.

This is the final Echo of this semester and of 1987. We will return in February.

The Echo editorial staff extends our thanks to the reporters, photographers, and typesetters who have worked with us this year, and wish the entire campus a happy Hanukkah, a merry Christmas, and a happy New Year. To the students, good luck on final exams, and to graduating seniors, congratulations.

SHORTS:

(CR) Tests of an experimental drug at the U. of Tennessee went sour when the subjects, UT dental and medical students, developed severe side effects, according to an $11 million suit filed by the students against the drug's manufacturer. Twelve students joined the suit against Beechman Laboratories, claiming that they were warned of mild side effects from the experimental antidepressant, but experienced vomiting, cramps, anxiety, and muscle tremors bad enough to land eight of them in the hospital overnight!

(OCR) Foreigners who are communists or members of communist-affiliated organizations cannot be denied visas on that basis alone. That's the upshot of a recent decision by the U.S. Supreme Court. The U.S. Justice Department had denied visas to several foreign nationals invited to speak on college campuses because of their political affiliations. The U.S. Court of Appeals disallowed the denial. On appeal to the high court, the justices tied 3-3, thereby upholding the Court of Appeals' ruling. (A majority vote is needed to overturn a lower court decision.)

(OCR) -- Play it again, Ollie. He was barred from showing his slide show supporting the Reagan administration's Central America policy, so Lt. Colonel Oliver North is taking the show to college campuses across the country. The slides, until recently classified photos and charts, include Soviet ships patrolling the Caribbean Ocean and Cuban children learning addition with guns and grenades.

(OCR) Proof that "girls just wanna have fun"? By most accounts, the majority of condom purchases are by women -- on and off campus. An employee of Westvend, maker of condom vending machines, puts the figure at 65 percent. Whatever the percentage, there clearly is interest on the part of the female buying public. An official at the University of Nebraska-Omaha's health center explains, "Women usually take the responsibility for sexual activity."

(OCR) -- The choice of a new contract. By switching the brands in cafeteria soda dispensers from Coke products to Pepsi products, U. of Pennsylvania officials saved more money to put toward food items like filet of tenderloin. But many students strongly opposed the switch -- angry notes crowded the cafeteria bulletin board, most in favor of bringing back Coke.

(OCR) -- Walking the beat. Now, the U. of North Carolina-Chapel Hill has joined the number of schools having an organized student patrol. Campus police and student government have employed students to patrol parking lots and areas around residence halls. They will report any suspicious behavior to campus security.

Library News:

Circulation head Diane Brandsborg wants to remind all students that all library materials are due December 7. Any overdue books or unpaid fines which are not taken care of by this day will result in grades or transcripts being held.

She added, however, that if any student "desperately" needs the material for a longer period of time, it may be renewed until December 14.

Traffic report corrected

by Jimmy Simerly

The information given in the previous article about campus parking/traffic activities was not entirely correct.

No warnings will be given for future violations.

All traffic violation are to be paid by the 15th of the following month. All fines will have $5.00 added to them per month they remain unpaid.

One citation will be given for parking on the grass. After one offense, a citation will be given and the vehicle towed.

The Traffic Committee continues to discourage resident students from driving to any campus functions.

If you have any questions, contact Kristy Miller, chairperson of the Traffic Committee, at Box 2141.

Alexander to head UT; hasty search ends in controversy

by Jennifer C. Worth

The transition of administrative leadership is not proving as smooth for the University of Tennessee as it did for MC.

In an unprecedented move, UT's presidential search committee cut short its search to vote unanimously select ex-governor Lamar Alexander as the next president of the university system. On January 22, the Board of Trustees voted 21-0 to confirm Alexander's nomination.

The abbreviated search has raised controversy among students, faculty, and some community members who feel that the search committee neglected its obligation and failed to follow due process. Seventeen other candidates were never interviewed.

One trustee, Paul Kinser of Chattanooga, abstained from the voting, calling the hasty process an insult to people who had worked to ensure a thorough search.

Other trustees have said that it would be unfair to continue the time and expense of the search, only to return to first choice Alexander.

UT - Knoxville, student Michelle Bullis echoed this idea, saying, "Maybe they should have gone through with the process, but he [Alexander] probably would have gotten the nomination anyway. The other interviews would have been pointless."

Bullis also said of the search, "It doesn't really bother me, since Lamar [Alexander] was the first choice."

Another UT student, Tim Dial, had no problems with the committee's actions; he said, "For once, they didn't go through the red tape that you would expect UT to go through."

Among those opposing the manner of the nomination are UTK student body President Rusty Gray, UT - Chattanooga professor Peter Pringle, and the 21-member advisory panel of faculty, students, and staff appointed by Bill Johnson, trustee and head of the search committee. The panel, chaired by Irvin Reid, dean of UTC's School of Business Administration, made a last-minute attempt to delay the nomination.

Alexander, asked last August to become a candidate for the post, refused, hinting that he might enter the 1988 presidential race.

In November, Johnson asked Alexander to reconsider; Alexander told Johnson he would postpone a decision until after the completion of his sabbatical in Australia.

On January 13, Alexander notified Johnson

Feb. Meetings to center on hunger

by Lynn King

"The Challenge of World Hunger" is the title of the CIV program to be presented at MC February 25, as well as the theme around which the 1988 February Meetings will revolve.

Guest speaker Arthur Simon is the founding executive director of Bread for the World, a Christian citizens' movement and the nation's largest lobby that focuses on hunger issues.

Simon is a Lutheran clergyman whose book Bread for the World won the national Religious Book Award in 1976 and currently has more than 300,000 copies in print.

Other books by Simon include Faces of Poverty, and Christian Faith and Public Policy -- No Grounds for Divorce. He has also written articles for a number of major journals and publications, in addition to appearing on the Today Show for World Food Day in the fall of 1986, the PBS documentary "Fight Against Hunger," NPR radio, and other national and local interviews. Incidentally, he is the brother of Democratic presidential hopeful Paul Simon.

Simon's CIV presentation is scheduled for Thursday, February 25, at 11 a.m. in the FAC Music Hall. In addition to the CIV, Simon will visit Dr. Scott Brunger's class in Economic Development on the following Friday and will conduct a Dorm Discussion in Lloyd lobby at 7 p.m. Friday that he wished to be considered for the post. Soon after, the committee nominated him. He will take office July 1, when UT's current president, Ed Boling, will retire.

In a January 20 speech to UTK students and the Faculty Senate, quoted in the Daily Beacon, Alexander said, "The first step is to find who we are and to be confident with ourself."

Why hunger as the focus of this year's annual time of religious emphasis? "I think it's a very valid and important issue," Chaplain Earl Rash said. He believes that it is particularly important for college students to consider the issues involved and to ask the question "How can we as individuals have an impact?"

Rash believes that Bread for the World has impact transcending the mechanical, as this action-oriented group raises issues, as opposed to merely combating hunger.

Essentially, through aiming its efforts at changing legislation, national policy, etc., Bread for the World works to change the situations which allow the existence of hunger in addition to the more immediate action of working to alleviate it.

Rash describes this year's somewhat streamlined approach to February Meetings as an "effort to concentrate." Historically, the meetings lasted for an entire week; classes were even cancelled in the early days of February Meetings when there was "almost a captive audience," according to Rash.

Now, however, as the meetings are competing with so many different interests, it seems more effective to incorporate February Meetings into regularly scheduled areas,

Hazelwood case chips at First

"A school need not tolerate student speech that is inconsistent with its basic educational mission even though the government could not censor similar speech outside the school," wrote Supreme Court Justice Byron R. White for the court.

The decision in Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier sets a dangerous precedent in limiting high school students' First Amendment rights.

Several high school officials have assured reporters from the Associated Press and the Knoxville News-Sentinel that they will not take advantage of the ruling to censor student publications unless it is "absolutely necessary" to do so. But if even one principal abuses this ruling to make a p-r or a "cheerleader" out of a student publication, the harm is real and rights have been sacrificed.

All journalistic publications -- professional or otherwise -- are bound by principle to adhere to accuracy, truthfulness, impartiality, and good taste. No such publication should be bound by government of school pressures to print only a certain kind of news.

The two articles in question in the Hazelwood case concerned parental divorce, seen through students' eyes, and teen pregnancy.

If the articles, printed in a school publication called Spectrum in 1983, were slanted, salacious, or poorly researched, the advisor should have omitted them from that edition and perhaps sent them back to the reporters for revision. That is the job of the editors and publishers on the "real world." It is not the job of the government or of a school administrator.

Yet the Supreme Court has given that power to them.

If the effect of this ruling is to prevent the publication of articles that do not follow journalistic ethics, then it will be tolerable in practice, albeit deplorable in principle. Unfortunately, however, some principals and school officials will probably use the ruling to censor content that they consider inappropriate. Needless to say, what student journalists consider appropriate and what school officials consider appropriate do not always mesh. The Echo has encountered this phenomenon.

Censorship of journalistic publications can go in two directions, both poisonous to journalistic ethics and to First Amendment rights: the publication may become useless and toothless, or it may become dangerous, containing implied or actual propaganda that is taken for truth by the readers.

If this warning sounds like paranoia, consider the media that you encounter every day. Student publications can be as significant to their readers as the nightly news or the New York Times is to others, and just as entitled to full First Amendment protection.

Student explains room search

by Andi Bristol

The room inspection two weeks ago by Student Affairs upset me, as I am sure it did many of you. I don't like the idea of anyone being in my room around my personal effects when I am not there.

On the other hand, I understand the need for these safety inspections and realize that advance warning would defeat the purpose of inspecting at all, because people who were aware of the violations could hide the safety problems during the period of inspection then return the potentially hazardous materials to use.

The purpose for the inspection was to look for fire hazards, such as improper extension cords and high wattage appliances and rodent and insect risks such as open food, dirty dishes, and general mess.

Contrary to the rumors that have abounded since the inspection, Jane Richardson, dean of students, did not search drawers or closets looking for any other types of violations. Closets were opened to check for refrigerators, and drawers were opened in some cases, but only far enough to release any cords tangled in them.

If Richardson had been actively searching out other drug or alcohol violations, wouldn't a lot of people have been written up? Only one person was written up, and that was because the violation was out in plain view.

I know for a fact that if they had been looking for other violations of that sort a good many of us students would have been written up, but we weren't. The purpose of the inspection was clearly stated and strictly adhered to.

I don't like people going through my room any more than anyone else does, but I do realize that the inspection rectified several hazards in the dorms -- hazards that if left alone could have killed or injured any of us.

I also don't like it when rumors explode to proportions that are unbelievable; there are better ways to state a complaint or vent frustration about the way this college is run. When there are enough problems with the way this school is run, there is no need for lies to be spread.

Finally, anyone who had something confiscated may claim his property in the Office of Student Affairs.

Afghanistan situation: Senator calls for action now

by Senator Gordon J. Humphrey

In its seven years of bloody warfare in Afghanistan, the Soviet Army has inflicted over one million casualties, mostly among non-combatants -- women, children, and the elderly -- and produced five million Afghan refugees.

Tragically, the Soviets have largely succeeded in hiding their grisly crimes from the world. As catalogued by a number of human rights groups, these include burning civilians alive, bayonetting pregnant women, flinging the elderly from helicopters, and bombing and shelling villages indiscriminately. The scale is so vast that a United Nations report warn that it inevitably to a situation approaching genocide."

In spite of these atrocities, for most nations, ours included, it's "business as usual" with the Soviets and their puppets in Kabul.

Afghan "puppet" diplomats are still recognized as the d as the legitimate representatives of the Afghan people at the United Nations. The Afghan seat at the U.N. is held by traitors who maintain that Soviet forces were "invited" to Afghanistan to help maintain order. The New York Times has rightly called for the expulsion of these imposters. But its call has gone unheeded by the U.S. and other governments.

While we encourage and assist the Afghan resistance in its struggle to liberate Afghanistan, we confer legitimacy on a regime which is cooperating with the Soviets in the genocide of the Afghan people.

By sending these mixed signals, the United States appears weak in its support of the Afghan freedom struggle. Unfortunately, the American people, generally uninformed as to the extent of carnage in Afghanistan, ask few hard questions of our government.

Americans deserve better than half-hearted policy in Afghanistan. You can play a role by letting your representatives in Washington know how you feel about the U.S. maintaining diplomatic relations with a government that has overseen the murder of a million of its own citizens.

College students can also assist the Afghan freedom fight in other ways. Students can organize letter-writing campaigns, fund-raising drives, class donations of food and clothing, and peaceful demonstrations in support of the resistance. Student groups can show various films depicting the fight in Afghanistan to raise awareness of their peers.

Additionally, students can become active by sponsoring Afghan patients for medical treatment in the United States. Wounded freedom fighters and refugees arrive in the United States every month, needing sponsors to arrange hospital care and other assistance. My office and the congressional task force on Afghanistan will be happy to assist you in this effort.

These are tangible ways you can help the Afghan people -- a people who need your help desperately.

They can't do it alone, though. Let's do all we can to help the Afghans regain their country and live in peace again.

Inmate requests letters

I am a prisoner on death row at the Arizona State Prison, and I was wondering if you would do me a favor. I have been here for quite a while and have no friends or family on the outside to write to. So, I was wondering if you would put an ad or maybe an announcement in your campus newspaper for me, for correspondence. I know that you are not a pen pal club or anything like that, but I would really appreciate it if you could help me.

I am a caucasian male, age 40, who desires correspondence with either male or female college students. I want to form a friendly relationship and more or less just exchange past experiences and ideas.

I will answer all letters and exchange pictures. If interested, write to Box B-38604, Florence, Arizona, 85232.

Sincerely yours,

NEWS/FEATURE

'88 grads' job outlook brightens

(OCR) -- An annual study of more than 1,000 employers reports it's going to be a good year for college grads.

The survey, conducted by Michigan State University's Placement Services, shows job openings for new grads will be up 3.8 percent this year.

Even though large corporations have been cutting back their staffs, many cuts have been at middle-management levels. They often have openings in entry-level positions.

Still, new college graduates will find most job opportunities in small corporations and businesses. Many smaller companies are increasing their new hires by 10 to 17 percent.

Starting salaries for grads with a bachelor's degree will average about $22,600, up three percent from a year ago. Grads with master's degrees will average about $27,700, and MBAs will earn about $31,260. Ph.D.s can expect to earn slightly more,

Of course, salaries differ considerably among professions. A new chemical engineer with a bachelor's degree will earn about $30,200. However, a new teacher will average $19,000 (up 2.8 percent from last year).

Job opportunities differ from one region of the country to another. Best is the Southwest, followed by the Northeast, Southeast, and North Central regions.

Money woes cause dropouts

COLLEGE PARK, MD (CPS) -- About a third of the students who drop out of college leave for money reasons, a five-year examination of dropout patterns by the University of Maryland concluded.

Trying to discover why students left college before graduating, Maryland's Student Affairs Office started following the progress of some 800 1980 freshmen, divided into a "representative" group of students from varied backgrounds and a "minority group" of black students.

In all, almost 18 percent of the "representative group" and 21 percent of the "minority group" eventually left college.

Thirty-two percent of the "representative" and 44 percent of the "minority" dropouts said they left for financial reasons.

"That's a problem that higher education is facing right now," conceded Maryland Chancellor John Slaughter. "This campus must [provide more financial aid], but this campus shares that problem with the rest of the nation."

The Maryland study also showed that few of the dropouts used the counseling and advising resources available on the campus to help them solve money problems.

Auditions set for Our Town

by Jennifer C. Worth

At exactly 42 degrees, 40 minute latitude and 70 degrees, 37 minutes longitude lies Grover's Corners, New Hampshire, the setting for Thornton Wilder's 1938 play, Our Town.

Our Town will be MC Theatre's spring production. Auditions will be held February 17 and 18. Theatre Director Frank Bradley is looking for a large cast. There are approximately six major female roles and six major male roles; three roles are especially large: George, Emily, and the Stage Manager, the enigmatic figure who narrates the play, takes on various minor roles, and occasionally serves as Greek Chorus. In addition, there are numerous smaller roles; the play provides for an unlimited number of towns people.

Bradley said of his choice, "Our Town is one of those plays that is often done and always welcomed." He added, "I like Our Town, despite the fact that it is often done."

He is quick to stress that the plays popularity does not make it trite. On the contrary he said, "The play lends itself to new interpretations."

MC's production of Our Town will be based on Bradley's interpretation, which will, avoid nostalgia and over-sentimentality. Bradley said, "Typical productions of Our Town tend to go overboard in sentimentality. The play doesn't lend itself to that.... It's another approach that I'm taking."

That approach is founded on Bradley's conviction that the play does not intend to draw the audience into small-town nostalgia, but rather to observe Wilder's slice-of-life presentation from a removed vantage point.

"It's as if we, the audience, are standing outside this culture," said Bradley, adding, "I'm going to make a conscious effort to distance the audience from that lifepresented in the play."

Bradley pointed to the presence of the pragmatic Stage Manager, who serves, through his comments on the action and his direct addresses to the audience, to de-sentimentalize the play and to separate the audience from the play.

The set that Bradley plans will also de-sentimentalize the play, as well as to emphasize its universal themes and motifs. The stage, as instructed by Wilder's stage directions, will be bare and black. Bradley said of this design, "That's not very sentimental." Starlight will be projected behind and around the acting area. "It's in an undefinable, almost unearthly kind of setting," Bradley said.

What is the play about? "It deals in many ways with people's problems with relating to each other," Bradley said. Problems with relationships -- social, familial, and romantic -- are compounded by the reserved nature of the people and the culture. The society of turn-of-the-century rural New England was extremely reserved in terms of relationships; Bradley said of the play, "It deals with the way human beings can go through life stifling themselves."

Although often perceived as presenting life under a rosy glow, Our Town contains a "combination of the pleasant and unpleasant" said Bradley. There is a birth and marriage, but there is also loss and death.

At any rate, Our Town will be a familiar name to the area theatre goers. Bradley sees that as an asset. He said, "people enjoy seeing what they know."

This production is not to be strictly an MC effort; Bradley hopes to attract community members, as well as MC students, faculty, and staff. He feels that more widespread town-college participation would "bring the community together." he

Tommy Knockers fails to score for frightmaster King

by Russ Thomas

The talented "fright man" of writing at this time has a mere four books out doing well on the shelves. Stephen King, author of Misery, It, The Eye of the Dragon and now The Tommy Knockers reportedly received $10 million in advance for the latter two.

As I read The Tommy Knockers, I wonder why King received so much for it. The Tommy Knockers was not scary; it was gross.

When King can't frighten you to death, he'll try to gross you out. This added that this particular play would be especially suitable for that kind of cooperation.

book is full of vomit, menstrual blood, and green slime. Even the Electrolux goes insane.

Bobbi Anderson is King's heroine until she begins to change. She is a novelist who lives alone in Maine with her dog, Peter. She is slim, trim, and pretty, and as King puts it, "has small breasts," with her hair pulled back in a ponytail.

Anderson finds a buried flying saucer that causes music in one's head and blood to flow from one's nose. The metal from the saucer also makes Peter younger. She digs the saucer out of the ground.

The hero of this story is Jim Gardner, a drunken poet who was in love with Bobbi some time ago. He wants to kill himself but won't because he feels Bobbi needs him.

He goes to help and is safe from The Tommy Knockers because of a steal plate in his head. He finds Bobbi crazy because the aliens made her dig up the ship alone. They've also taught her neat inventions to save time and money, like how to power her house on D-cell batteries.

The more of the ship she digs up, the more people in town become sick. very time the reader begins to be interested in a character, King kills him off.

I see no way $10 million is appropriate for this book. King mentions he's had the book on his desk since 1982. That's were it should have stayed.

Witty Williams wins with Good Morning, Vietnam

by Jennifer C. Worth

"Good morning, Vietnam!" exclaims the strident voice on Armed Forces Radio, Saigon. And GIs listen.

The voice belongs to Adrian Cronauer, played by Robin Williams. As Saigon's newest deejay he brings fresh energy and sharp wit to demoralized troops. Unfortunately, his superiors do not admire him -- his profanity, his satire, his dirty jokes, and his rock music -- like the troops do. And thus a movie is born.

Good Morning, Vietnam is not an ordinary Vietnam movie. Except for several montages, there are no battle scenes. Cronauer's light is behind the lines.

To a sergeant-major with no humor and a lieutenant to whom the height of comedy is having jokes published in Reader's Digest, Cronauer is subversive. They detest his biting assessments of military intelligence ("Everybody we meet, we ask 'em if they're the enemy"), and news censorship ("According to the army, nothing at all happened in Saigon today"), and almost everything else, from jungle wear to the weather.

To troops fighting an increasingly unwinnable war for increasingly unclear reasons, Cronauer's hours on the air are both a source of diverting entertainment and a form of release. As a sympathetic senior officer notes, Cronauer is just what Vietnam morale needs.

But the intricacies of Vietnamese loyalties and the labyrinthine course of military justice take their toll of Cronauer and his position.

Good Morning, Vietnam is just the vehicle for Williams needed to showcase his talents: his rapid-fire improvisational comedy that makes him such a hit on stage and his dramatic acting, seen in some of his earlier films.

Williams is a delight in Good Morning, Vietnam, as is the supporting cast. For instance, few moviegoers will forget polka-playing Lt. Hauk ("In my heart, I know I'm funny.")

This movie is not perfect. For instance, several tired clichés surface, such as the virtuous young Vietnamese girl torn between her attraction to the GI and her commitment to her country's rich culture and uncertain future. But Williams' strong performance and the successful partnership of scripting and casting overshadow the flaws.

Go see Good Morning, Vietnam. And in the meantime, here's something by Martha Reeves and the Vandellas. . .

Rock'n'roll 'Poison'?

by Mike Wallace

I have always loved rock and roll. But lately my ears have noticed a band whose music is polluting the airwaves.

When I first heard the infamous L.A. band, Poison, I thought they were just another run-of-the-mill band that would soon vanish like most bands of their caliber. But with unappealing songs and a lot of makeup, Poison somehow managed to make it big.

Songwriting is the worst element of this hard-rocking quartet. In songs like "Talk Dirty to Me" the bleach-blond C. C. DeVill wails out clichéd guitar lines that make your ears beg for a vintage Van Halen album.

De Vill's guitar

licks in unison with Brett Michael's dull voice and long-practiced lyrics, as in the ingeniously titled "I Want Action Tonight," only show the band's musical insensibility.

Poison's appearance is more shocking than their music is artless. Copying the once-upon-a-time supergroup Kiss, the four glamorous boys look like cover girls for McCall's magazine. I guess the eyeshadow is trying to make up for their poor music.

The only thing I like about this band is their appropriately titled debut album -- Look What the Cat Dragged In. Poison survived only because of their glam-rock outfits and makeup.

They wear it well, but their music could use some dressing up of its own.

It now has two alternative student papers: The Fourteenth Circle at UT-Martin and The Lane Monkey at UT-Knoxville. Are they part of a nationwide trend echoing the '60s? San Francisco's Center for Investigative Reporting said it's hard to say; keeping track of the numbers is tough, since "they often come and go in six months."

(OCR) -- Video cheating has emerged as the latest student shortcut to reading. Instead of reading classics like The Grapes of Wrath or Wuthering Heights, students have been renting the movies. And the trend doesn't sit well with educators. Education videos are nothing new, but they're meant to supplement the written material, not replace it. Said one professor, "If it's institutionally approved, the consequences would be appalling; people would cease learning how to read."

Students scan the list and, if they find a book they want, receive the seller's name, address, and phone number.

★ THE CANDIDATES

by Jennifer C. Worth

Jobs key to budget

Senator Paul Simon, bow-tie clad and plain-faced, asks in his campaign slogan, "Isn't it time to believe again?"

From a small town in downstate Illinois, Simon runs heartland-based campaign promising truth in advertising, an approach that has benefitted from the credibility lapses of other candidates.

Simon also promises to balance the budget by 1992. The key to this plan is a drop in unemployment, to yield 45 billion dollars, and lowered interest rates, to yield between 30 and 40 billion dollars. He would offer tax incentives to urge job creation in the private sector, hoping a drop in interest rates would follow.

If those measures do not succeed, Simon would raise income taxes for the above-$100,000 bracket and institute oil-import fees, a "hidden tax."

He would, in addition, cut 10 to 20 billion dollars from defense.

He has energetically touted his Guaranteed Job Opportunity Program, reminiscent of Franklin Roosevelt's Work Progress Administration. The program would provide simple work projects for persons out of work more than five weeks. The pay would be minimum wage or 10 percent over the recipient's welfare or unemployment pay, whichever is higher; participants would work 32-hour weeks, with a day free for jobhunting.

As Senator, Simon voted for the balanced-budget amendment and for Gramm-Rudman, underscoring his belief to a balanced budget.

When U.S. News and World Reports asked Simon what the first thing he would do as president would be, he answered that he would immediately try to halt U.S.-Soviet nuclear testing.

for what he considers the breakthrough in verification.

Bush promises that his own presidency would be effective in dealing with U.S.-Soviet relations, pointing to his diplomatic missions to Moscow during the past seven years.

Some of the issues in the Bush platform, such as

Kemp aims right

Representative

Jack Kemp is trying to become, in the voters' eyes, the conservative alternative to Republican front-runners George Bush and Robert Dole.

His most vocal stance, so far, has been his outspoken pledge to preserve Social Security benefits, which he has championed in response to what he sees as legislative threats to the program.

In public statements and ads, Kemp has accused Bush and Dole of trying in the past to freeze Social Security benefits. Newsweek quoted him as saying that anyone who wants to mess around with Social Security could use "a prefrontal lobotomy."

Kemp has discussed an optimistic budget plan. Whereas several candidates, like Simon and Bruce Babbitt, are grudgingly including tax increases in their budget "white paper" and others, such as Bush, are refusing to raise taxes, Kemp intends to cut taxes.

He also promises to include subsidies for the poor in his economy.

These measures will be offset with financial reform, the details of which are vague.

One important support for education and prevention of government corruption, are distinctly noncontroversial. Other issues, like his opposition to abortion, are more sensitive.

The albatross of the Bush campaign is the Iran-Contra scandal. Bush claims no decision-level involvement, saying he didn't know about the proposed deal until December 1986. The Tower Commission findings back him up, but some journalists and investigators have pointed to earlier memos as indicating that Bush was involved earlier and more extensively.

Bush and his public relations team have been energetically attacking the vice-president's "wimp" image. In the first debate among the Republican candidates, Bush showed calm tenacity in his tendency not to pick fights but to answer in kind when attacked.

budget tool, according to Kemp, would be a line-item veto for the budget, which would allow the Chief Executive to veto some of the expenditures and revenues in the Congressional budget plan without rejecting the entire proposed budget.

Kemp, pointing to the economic indicators that signal a growing economy, does not share the bleak, "drastic-change-is-needed" outlook of most of the other candidates.

Kemp is outspoken on the issue of foreign policy, especially U.S.-Soviet relations. He feels the U.S. needs to be stronger in this area.

He also feels strongly about abortion. He opposes legalized abortion, contending that not only the mother but also the unborn child should have constitutional protection.

Populism: Will it win Gephardt?

Four years ago, when President Reagan's landslide reelection was still in the works, Congressman Richard Gephardt decided to run for the job. Three years later, he became the first candidate to register for the 1988 presidential campaign.

Gephardt's platform is based in populist appeal. For instance, he has promised not to trim any middle-class benefits. His ads and speeches are full of negative references to "corporate America" and "the establishment."

His economic stance is also influenced by populism and nationalism, seen in his "get tough" trade attitude. He favors measures that would undercut America's trade deficits, while at the same time denying charges of protectionism.

In the House, he authored the Gephardt Amendment, which protects American labor. One specific measure he favors is an oil-import fee, a "hidden tax," which would assist domestic oil producers but mean a price rise at the gas pump.

His plan to attack the deficit includes 35 billion dollars, to be extracted from stricter enforcement of the IRS.

He is committed to revitalizing education. He has also spoken out on Nicaragua, favoring a cutoff in aid to the contras paired with hardheaded negotiations with the Sandinistas.

On some issues, including his opposition to movie colorization, he has been accused of trying to be all things to all people. He has equivocated on his view of abortion; he now says that the current law should not be changed.

Seen as possessing what Time described as "a basic set of heartland values," Gephardt is popular among his House colleagues: 80 or so support his campaign.

(First of a series on the 1988 Presidential candidates)

Bush stays moderate

For seven years, he has held the second-highest office in the country; now he is aiming a step higher.

Vice-President George Bush is coming out from behind the President's elbow to lead, with the help of his name recognition factor, the Republican hopefuls.

His economic platform is optimistic. For instance, he has solemnly promised not to raise taxes, but he has not yet presented "white papers" outlining specific budget plans.

Bush is the only Republican candidate who wholeheartedly supports the Intermediate Nuclear Forces (INF) treaty. He lauds the Reagan-Gorbachev agreement not only for setting a schedule for the reduction of nuclear missiles in Europe, but also

In an attempt to gain a greater understanding of student life, members of the University of Minnesota Board of Regents recently toured the campus and dined in the cafeteria -- much to the horror of a student newspaper reporter. And one gun owner fears that his weapon will get stolen if he leaves it in his car.

Teamwork succeeds for 13-4 Scots on the court

by Craig Farmer

The men's varsity basketball team seems to have found the formula for success. They started the season with two wins and two losses, and now after seven wins in a row, they have a current record of 13 wins and four losses. They are 7-2 in the O.D.A.C. (Old Dominion Athletic Conference).

When asked about the team's turnaround from last season, Coach Randy D. Lambert emphasized some of the major points that make the team work and win. He said "Each player has learned his role on the floor and the fundamentals of better defense."

The Scots' multiple defense system (man, zone, pressure), along with team chemistry have enabled them to win. The team gets its strength from unity. Lambert said, "There's no room for individualistic play on this team." The Scots probably won't have someone on the all-tournament team because of, according to Lambert, "the consistency of five players and

Athletic dept. to change from the Old Dominion Conference

by Nancy Oberholtzer

Maryville College sports are in the last year with ODAC -- the Old Dominion Athletic Conference. According to Randy Lambert, MC's athletic director, the financial and academic burden was too great to tolerate any longer.

MC currently belongs to ODAC, along with seven other colleges from the Virginia area. That means MC athletes must drive to Virginia for every conference game.

This conference is not limited to football. It includes soccer, men's basketball, and baseball. That's a lot of time on the road for the athletes involved in these sports; it's also expensive.

MC athletic teams belong to WIAC -- the Women's Intercollegiate Athletic Conference. They play teams in Kentucky and Tennessee and don't have to travel so far.

According to Lambert, MC is currently working on several options, but it takes time. Applications must be submitted to the various conferences, and, as with any bureaucracy, there is a lot of red tape to wade through.

Lambert said, "It's going to be an ongoing thing for some time. I don't see anything changing for the next three or four months."

Lambert said that there are three options available to MC. One is to be independent and play the schools MC chooses to play.

The second option is to join the CAC -- the College Athletic Conference. Lambert said MC has already sent them some information; he expects to hear from the CAC in the spring after their spring meeting.

The third option is to start a new conference. MC has talked to several other colleges in a 180- to 200-mile radius, according to Lambert. Many of them are small colleges and don't have a football program, but the possibility is still open.

Lambert said, "We're looking into all three possibilities, and hopefully something will come out of it." He added, "We're looking at what's best for the athletes."

Lady Scots climb from slump to rank third in the WIAC

by Lori Chambers

The Maryville Lady Scots basketball program has made a drastic change from last season. Having won only one game last year, the Lady Scots were not expected to do much this year, but they have changed a lot of people's minds.

The Scots have accumulated a record of 11-5, moved from the bottom of the conference to third place, and have been ranked eighth in the South by the NCAA poll for Division III.

The Lady Scots have had two changes in the program this season: first is new head coach Wes Moore, and second is a new attitude of teamwork.

When asked how he felt about the Lady Scots and their progress, Moore had not just one. He said, "We are getting quality play from the bench, and they are pushing our starters to do better."

Coming off the bench is Dean Walsh, averaging eight points a game; Brett Stanley, averaging 7.5 points; and James Austin, six points.

On the subject of the O.D.A.C. tournament, Lambert said, "Our goal is to finish in the top four seats of the tournament, so we will be able to play the first-round game at home."

Lambert felt the only weaknesses of the team were offense consistency, this to say: "The young ladies on this year's team are trailblazers. They are establishing a winning attitude, which is what you must do before you can start thinking about championships. They've worked awfully hard to reach their present status, which will make it easier for the future Lady Scots teams to reach even greater heights."

The Scots are made up of four veterans who have provided leadership and experience on the floor. There are four freshmen that have provided the team with enthusiasm and excitement. The veterans are senior Pam Gunter, and sophomores Lisa Anderson, Penny Carden, and Jenny Patterson.

The rookies for the Scots are Valerie Matlock, Wendy Kallstrom, Lori lapses of execution, and making smart decisions at crucial times in the game.

One area that Lambert feels needs improvement is campus support. He said, "I'd like to see better support from our student population on campus. Our student body is not giving the men's or women's basketball teams the support they deserve."

Pat Heldman, point guard, said, "We have a talented team with no 'individuals,' and a good team

Chambers, and Julie Lillard.

Penny Carden, co-captain, said about the team, "Our attitude is better. Coach Moore knows how to get us to play to the best of our ability."

Lisa Anderson, co-captain, had this to say about the two changes that were made from last season: "Hard work, team play, and the desire to win have been a tremendous factor in the Lady Scots' success this year. Credit has to go to Coach Moore. He has been dedicated to the team not only on the court but off the court as well. His dedication and determination and our desire have made a winning combination for the Lady Scots."

She explained her outlook for the Lady Scots this way: "Hopefully, this year's success will pave the way for the future Lady Scots."

"For the recruits it will be easier to come to a school with a winning record than one with a losing record," Carden said.

The Lady Scots of Maryville College carry a great amount of pride with their winning record. They started conditioning last September 14, when some college teams were sitting around relaxing. The Scots survived aerobics, sprints, distance running, and even a one-mile timed run on Friday morning during pre-season.

Student Programming

by Frank Fiore

Well, Well, it's spring semester. The holidays have passed, and interim has come to a close. It's time to take a look at the coming student programming calendar.

Unlike last semester, most of the social events on the campus for this semester are already planned. This planning should help things to run more efficiently than they have previously.

Of course, just how smoothly things run depends upon the level of student involvement. The more people there are, the more we can accomplish.

As it stands now, the movies will continue to be shown in Isaac's on Wednesdays at 8:00 p.m. The number of movies being shown is being cut in half because of the lack of student participation.

Several dances are scheduled this semester. February 13 will be the night of February Fantasy dance in Pearson's hall.

March will feature Mardi Gras in Lloyd, on the 5th; there will be a "new music" dance on the 11th.

In April, students will be able to dance all night at the Moontan Party.

Of course, we can't forget the semiformal Spring Fling dance during May Madness Weekend.

There will be at least two Coffee Houses this semester. The first Coffee House will be in Isaac's on February 26. The second will be on April 16, during Parents' Weekend. More Coffee Houses can be added, if there is a desire among students.

Other events this semester include: Casino Night in Gamble Hall on February 20, St. Patrick's Day study break/party, an all night Monty Python movie marathon, the Post-Comps party for seniors, May Madness, and several "outdoor days" with volleyball, frisbee, music, and more.

There are still a few places where additional events can be planned. All interested students have to do is speak up!

What does MC do when it snows?

by Andi Bristol

Even though it hasn't felt like winter lately, those students who were on campus over interim still remember their experiences with the first storm of the season.

"A bunch of us went out sledding on the big hill by the soccer practice field," said freshman Debbie Clinton.

"I just sat on my couch and watched T.V.," admitted Cathy Cain, a sophomore.

"I went up to the mountains by myself and took a hike," said freshman Frank Schubert.

Senior Charlene Thompson said, "I wasn't here, but last year some friends and I went up to Cades Cove and played in three feet of snow."

While most of us are out enjoying the snow, the grounds crew, maintenance, and housekeeping are out trying to clear campus roads and walkways.

Business Manager Donna Davis said, "We have a tractor with a blade to clean the streets and parking lots."

'Who's Who' named

The 1988 edition of Who's Who among Students in American Universities and Colleges will include the names of 12 students from Maryville College who have been selected as national outstanding campus leaders.

Campus nominating committees and editors of the annual directory have included the names of these students based on their academic achievement, service to the community, leadership in extracurricular activities, and potential for continued success.

They join an elite group of students selected from more than 1,400 institutions of higher learning in all 50 states, the District of Columbia, and several foreign nations.

Students named this year from MC are: Karla Y. Beard, Donna Rhea Clancy, Donald Dove, Andrea Patricia Dye, DeAnn M. Hargis, Sherri Jones, Jennifer A. Judy, Lisa Harvey Linginfelter, Anne Marcum, Teresa Pettit, Julie Dodd Ramsey, and Melodie Dawn Sedgwick.

Dean's list announced

She went on to say, "Shovels are used on the sidewalks along with a mixture of salt, sand, and chat (fine gravel) to prevent freezing."

What happens when it snows? How do you find out if classes have been canceled? And who makes that decision?

If there has been considerable accumulation, then tune in to one of the radio or T.V. stations on the list to be notified by the college (these lists are available in the Communications Office) or check for notices from your Resident Director around the dorm.

The decision to cancel classes is ultimately made by President Richard Ferrin based on a recommendation by Susan Downey, vice-president for administration, and Academic Vice-president Dean Bolde in consultation with Security.

Scott Fletcher, player, said, "Team unity and pulling together has really made this season work." He added, "We've got six players averaging in the double figures, and last year we only had two."

Stan Ballard, player, said, "We are a little older and a more experienced team under pressure; that's what wins games and makes a difference."

New steps add to recruiting efforts

by Jimmy Simerly

The number of students enrolled at Maryville College could increase in coming years, due in part, but not exclusively, to the implementation of several new scholarships.

According to Admissions Director Leslie Nier, these new scholarships are part of an effort to increase the number of students at the college in the future and also to attract more students with widely varying interests who might otherwise go to different schools.

The incentive for the latter group of students is the new "M.C. Scholar" scholarship. In order to be considered for this scholarship, worth $2,000 per year, applicants should have a high school grade point average of 2.75 or higher. The extracurricular activities of candidates will also be considered in the awards process.

Nier said that the M.C. Scholar and other new scholarships are part of a "greater effort to market our [the college's] product." As such, the M.C. Scholar is particularly important because, according to Nier, it is designed for students who "have not only done well in academics," but all-around, as well.

For students whose interests are more focused, there are new scholarships offered in specific areas such as drama, choir, and debate, according to Nier. The drama and choral scholarships are each worth $1,000 per year and require that the student play an active role in these departments at the college. The debate scholarship is similar to these, except it is worth $1,500 per year.

In addition, the Blount County Graduate grant has been increased to $1,000 for incoming freshmen.

When asked about the success of these efforts to increase the number of students at Maryville College, Nier said that there is a projected 28 percent increase in the enrollment for the next academic year over this one. As proof, Nier said that the college has received twice as many deposits this year than it did at this time last year.

These new scholarships were made possible by a cooperative effort between Admissions and the President's Office, the latter which approved the budgetary increase to Financial Aid.

Stephens resigns

by Jennifer C. Worth

Larry Stephens' unexpected resignation as MC's head football coach has raised serious questions in the athletic department.

When Athletic Director Randy Lambert received Stephens' letter of resignation, he said, "I was shocked. . . . I was not expecting it." He also said, "At a time when everything in our department has been so positive, it was a crushing blow."

Lambert assessed the football players' reaction to the resignation and to the conflicting rumors surrounding it as "confused." He added, "I can understand their reaction."

Football player Russ Thomas said of the team's mood, "It's pretty bleak."

Stephens' main reasons for leaving MC were budget-related. Lambert said, "His major concerns were all financially based."

Stephens' letter of resignation cites "inadequate funding for the football program in such critical areas as equipment, facilities, and student financial aid" as his chief reason.

Lambert said of the football team's funding crunch, "It's the same old story in small college athletics. We never have the amount of money that we'd like to have."

MC President Richard Ferrin said, "There's no question that the head coaching position is not a high-paying position. There is also no question that the head coaching position is higher-paying than the average faculty position."

Lambert feels that some misconceptions have circulated concerning the situation. He said, "Some of the facts got distorted."

For instance, one rumor was that Stephens and his staff would receive no raise next year. Lambert said, "That is not true; they would receive the same raise that anyone on campus will receive."

Lambert also said that he was unaware of any football players' not being provided with cleats. Had this been the case, he said, "I should have been aware of Larry Stephens served as MC's head football coach for two years before resigning on Feb. 4.

Exploitation mars Olympics

Every four years the eyes of the world turn to one small spot on the globe, and internationally, people wait with bated breath to see the outcome of this fierce competition.

No, it's not the Iowa caucuses.

The event is the Olympics, that revered athletic institution where the best, fittest, and fastest amateur athletes compete for the most prestigious awards in their fields. Unfortunately the Olympics are also the occasion of media exploitation and advertising hucksterism.

It is perfectly understandable that an event this lengthy (the winter Olympics stretch 16 days this year) and popular (nightly prime-time ABC coverage) would attract the media like flies to honey.

But is it really necessary to interview Dan Jansen, American speed skating contender, on the painful subject of his sister's death with leukemia last Sunday? After a long struggle with cancer, Jane Jansen Beres died hours before her brother's first race, and the cameras and reporters were there for his reaction. Despite his status as temporary celebrity due to his membership on the U.S. Olympic team, this was an occasion of private grief. A little tasteful distance was in order from the media.

Almost as bad is the tendency of advertisers to jump on the Olympic bandwagon. Advertisers ranging from Kodak to Visa are eager, to their discredit, to cash in on their ties to the Olympics. Human nature demands that someone make money on the Olympics, but the flood of ads seems paradoxical when paired with the principles of sportsmanship and competition for competitions sake that the Olympics are supposed to promote.

Nothing is perfect, but it would be a credit to the print and broadcasting powers-that-be if the Olympics were less a media circus.

Some aid remains, why complaints?

Many people are complaining -- and with cause -- of a shortage of financial aid. It's true that there just isn't enough money to go around, not only at MC, but at a lot of small colleges.

But the fault cannot lie entirely with the government, the administration, or the benefactors, because at least some sources of financial aid go untapped by students.

This situation can be seen here at MC, in the number of work-study positions that have to be filled by off-campus workers. Either MC students just don't need any extra money (which we doubt), or they just don't want the inconvenience of working in Food Services or Maintenance. If the latter is the case, then there should be fewer complaints about the availability of financial aid.

It's hard to have a job, even a part-time, and still keep up with classes and have extra-curricular activities. Believe me, we know! But dozens of students manage it anyway. It just takes a larger degree of energy and a smaller amount of "bellyaching."

Permit me, a paraphrasing from the former radio show The Shadow, as I would inquire, "What good is hidden in the mind of a Maryville student? Only the student knows."

The year was 1948; it was a good one, when I was to have graduated. 1968 was twenty years and another

Afghan role debated

Editor, Highland Echo:

The recent column by Senator Gordon J. Humphrey urging students to take a more active role in supporting the Afghan freedom fighters should be viewed skeptically. While the role of the U.S.S.R. is deplorable, the U.S.'s role as antagonist should not be overlooked, nor should its support of Afghan "freedom fighters" go unquestioned.

Our support for the Mujahadin, religious fundamentalists much like the Iranian purists, defies our precept of support for just movements seeking to liberate their people. To insist that one incorrigible regime, the current government, be replaced by another, perhaps more cruel, regime defies logic and weakens what support the U.S. might gain.

Blindly allying ourselves with any who oppose the Soviet Union has contributed to support for such "democratic" states as Pakistan, where dissent is forbidden and punished while we look the other way.

Careful diplomacy between the U.S. and the Soviet Union is the only way to insure that each country's mercenary forces cease fighting and allow the people of Afghanistan to rebuild their country.

Sincerely,

Steve Ledman

THE CANDIDATES

by Jennifer C. Worth

Dole runs on political experience

Fighting for leadership of the Republican field is Senate Minority Leader Robert Dole, a man known for his sharp tongue and his ability to fight with tenacity.

Dole's campaign is based on his political record and legislative experience -- he has served as a representative and as a senator since 1961 -- and his image -- which he is working to soften. His campaign publicity is aimed primarily at promoting these qualities and at stressing the differences between Dole and his chief Republican competitor George Bush.

His budget plan is founded on a one-year cap on all federal programs' spending at two percent above the current levels. In 1985, Dole pushed a similar freeze through the Senate.

He supports a Presidential line-item veto for the budget and would favor a balanced-budget amendment.

Dole refuses a personal or corporate tax increase and would close tax loopholes. He favors oil-import fees, more sales of government assets, and implementing user fees on government services, such as national parks and waterways.

He supports freedom of navigation in the Persian Gulf, defending reflagging of tankers. He also supports SDI and aid to the Contras. He opposes abortion (he has long considered himself "pro-life"), and he opposes trade protectionism, planning to support industries hurt by unfair trade practices and enhance competitiveness by regulating reform.

He advocates a welfare program to provide education, training, and job counseling. He has also promised not to cut federal programs that, according to Fortune Magazine, affect "society's most vulnerable."

Aiming for populist appeal, Dole stresses his humble Kansas origins, disparaging Bush's privileged East Coast upbringing.

Dole's campaign appearances, from whistle-stops to candidate debates, are marked by humor. His wisecracks are usually

Gore's forte is for . policy

Tennessee Senator Albert Gore, Jr., likes to call himself "nonpartisan," and he stands for issues that tend to cut across the political spectrum, although his voting record tends further towards liberal than his moderate image suggests.

Gore has spent 12 years as a representative and as a senator. Politically, his strong suit is foreign policy. He was among the many Democrats who supported the INF treaty. He has also defended the reflagging of tankers in the Persian Gulf as a necessary step to ensure free trade and the integrity of international waterways.

He has taken negative stands against other Administration policies, such as the Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI), which he feels should be pursued only in the realms of research. He refuses to support deployment of SDI until it has been more thoroughly researched. Gore also opposes military aid to the Contras, favoring limited levels of humanitarian aid.

In a debate among the Democratic candidates, Gore condemned "the politics of retreat, complacency, and appealing to the audiences (Time called him the most humorous of the Republican candidates), but his jibes, often aimed at other candidates, can have a mean streak.

Dukakis stresses 'miracle'

Governor

Michael Dukakis is basing his campaign, in a large part, on what campaign observers and journalists have dubbed "the Massachusetts Miracle." His campaign promises, "I will do for America what I did for Massachusetts."

In 1975, before Dukakis' first term, Massachusetts had the highest unemployment rate in the U.S. Now, at 3.4 percent, Massachusetts' unemployment is the lowest of any industrial state's. A booming economy accompanies the state's lowered jobless rate.

On economics, Gore would use tax increases as a last resort to cut the deficit. He has drafted three taxes that, if implemented, he feels would raise 16 billion dollars. His first measures to trim the budget would be cutting defense spending and closing tax loopholes that benefit the wealthy. He would seek to improve education by improving teacher pay, increasing university research and development, and gradually lengthening the school year.

In spite of his apparent yuppie appeal -- at 39, Gore embodies young, affluent good looks while appearing sincere -- Gore has difficulty attracting supporters, in part because his speeches, which he writes himself, lack the fire to grab and hold audiences' attention for very long.

Another blow to Gore's popularity is the image

'Army' works for Robertson

One of 1987's most controversial issues was organized religion and its role in television and politics. In the midst of the publicity was Pat Robertson, founder of the Christian Broadcasting Network, who left his 700 Club position and stepped down as an ordained minister to enter the Republican race.

Robertson's campaign depends upon an "invisible army" of people new to politics who stir up Robertson support and urge reticent supporters to attend primaries and caucuses. The tactic succeeded in Iowa, where Robertson achieved a surprising second-place finish.

He opposes legalized abortion and pornography and favors school prayer. An economic rationale for his abortion stand is a wider tax base and full work force in the 21st century.

He has also spoken

see Candidates p. 4

establishing a 500 million dollar fund to create jobs and spur economic growth. He would also provide education, on-the-job training, and day care for welfare recipients.

Dukakis stresses his managerial skills, which he has utilized as governor. His campaign is well oiled, but not above intrigue: Dukakis staffers released the information that led to Joseph Biden's withdrawal from the race, then tried to pin the action on Richard Gephardt's staff.

Drawing on his gubernatorial background, Dukakis has adopted the Kennedyesque slogan, "Leadership for the '90s."

Dukakis' plan for the federal budget is based on tougher tax enforcement, which he expects to slash 35 billion dollars from the deficit. Following a pattern that raised 82 million dollars for Massachusetts in 1983, he would declare IRS amnesty, then educate taxpayers about accurately filling out tax forms, and then crack down on offenders. He points to 110 billion dollars which remains unpaid due to an 81 percent tax compliance rate.

To further fight the deficit, he would trim defense spending, cutting the Minuteman missile program. He refuses to raise taxes.

He would also try to end unfair trade practices such as dumping, and grant temporary relief to industries most hurt by foreign imports.

He opposed Contra aid in public statements and TV ads. He was among the candidates who supported the INF treaty.

He would seek to bolster the dollar by of his wife, Tipper, who co-founded the Parents' Music Resource Center in 1985 and was a leading figure in the record-ratings debate. She and Gore are fighting her anti-rock music image; for instance, they attended a fundraiser at Linelight, a New York rock 'n' roll club.

Gore is active in the Senate, serving on three committees, including Armed Services.

two years at Eastern Kentucky University and six years at Blount County's Heritage High School.

Lambert assessed Stephens' reasons by saying, "I felt like he was beginning to lay the groundwork for a successful program, but it was going to take time."

He added, "He left the job a couple of years early; he wasn't going to be able to reap the benefits of his hard work for a few years."

The department has already begun receiving applications for the position, and Lambert plans to name Stephens' successor in early March. Ferrin has named the search committee, which includes three team members: Dwight Henderlight, Jeff Reichert, and Hank Snyder.

On the outlook for the department and for the team, Lambert said, "We're going to remain positive." He said, "We've been through this before." He hopes the next coach will be able to build on the foundation laid by Stephens.

Stephens' resignation marks the sixth turnover in the head coaching position in ten years. Lambert said that, while "all of the coaches have been concerned with the budget," the "reason for the turnovers involves several underlying factors." For instance, he said, "We've made some bad decisions in the past -- Coach Stephens was not one of them -- on who we hired."

Lambert summed up the department's position by saying, "This whole thing is a touchy situation."

responsible for my return to campus in 1968 to do my independent study, which subsequently was published, on "The History of Athletics at Maryville College, 1866-1968" for the school's sesquicentennial celebration.

As we near the conclusion of the 1987-'88 academic year, I am actually praying sincerely that somewhere there is a rising senior or junior who needs a bit of inspiration for their independent study, and who would be interested in a similar topic.

I urge that student to consider the much-needed IMMEDIATE ACTION of bringing the athletic records of the Scots forward to cover the past 20 years.

It is imperative that someone immediately contact ALL former coaches to request records, scorecards,

Ballet Coppelia to come to life, Feb. 20, 21

by Lynn King

Coppelia, Leo Delibes' ballet classic which made its stage debut in Paris in 1870, will make its Maryville College debut this weekend.

The Appalachian Ballet Company in conjunction with the Maryville-Alcoa College-Community Orchestra (MACCO) will present Coppelia on Saturday, February 20, at 8:15 p.m., and on Sunday, February 21, at 2:30 p.m. in the MC Theatre Complex.

Coppelia is the third presentation of the 1987-'88 MACCO season. Dr. Harry Harter is the guest conductor.

Set in a Galician town in the seventeenth century, Coppelia was the first ballet ever to be built around the idea of a doll come to life.

The ballet tells the story of the eccentric inventor Dr. Coppélius, his beautifully lifelike doll Coppelia, and the lovers Franz and Swanilda in whose relationship the doll wreaks havoc. Believing Coppelia to be real, Franz falls in love with her, Swanilda becomes jealous, and the chaos begins.

In addition to being the first ballet based upon the theme of a doll become human, Coppelia was the first to introduce into ballet such European folk dances as the mazurka and the czardas.

Also, this was one of the first ballets to feature a musical score so masterfully done as to become popular independent of the ballet itself.

In the Appalachian Ballet Company's production of Coppelia, L. Michelle Pratt will dance the role of Coppelia, while James B. Nielsen performs as Franz.

After beginning dance training at the age of four, Pratt was invited to a summer study with the Houston Ballet at age twelve. The 1982 recipient of a scholarship from the Tennessee Association of Dance, Pratt has studied with the Hubbard Street Dance Company in Chicago and the Atlanta Ballet.

Pratt has performed with the Nashville City Ballet and the Chattanooga Ballet, as well as with the Appalachian Ballet at the Piccolo-Spoleto Arts Festival in Charleston, SC. She recently studied and performed as an apprentice with the Twyla Tharp Dance Company in New York.

James B. Nielsen, Franz in Coppelia, is a graduate of the University of Utah with a BA in ballet. He has danced with the Utah Ballet, Ballet West, and the Boston Ballet, appearing with the Boston Ballet in Knoxville during the World's Fair when the company performed Don Quixote.

Nielsen performed as Mike in A Chorus Line with the National Touring Company. He has also performed professionally with the Pioneer Theater Company in Utah in Hello, Dolly, West Side Story, and On Your Toes.

Lighting for Coppelia will be done by Lincoln Stulik, three-time Emmy winner for theatre and television lighting design. He is currently the lighting director for CBS.

The Appalachian Ballet Company, the area's leading classical ballet company and the only one in East Tennessee to perform regularly with live music, was chartered in 1972. In addition to other appearances, the company holds two major performances each year, including an annual presentation of The Nutcracker.

Five full-length classical ballets and five original ballets written expressly for the ABC are included in its repertoire. The company holds a selective academy for advanced dancers each summer, under the direction of world-renowned guest teachers.

Cheryl Van Metre is Artistic Director of the Appalachian Ballet Company. In addition to many impressive academic credits, she has choreographed six original ballets and is director of the Van Metre School of Dance, located on the third floor of Fayerweather Hall.

and other data that are obviously missing from proper storage areas; have them returned or copied for historical records; and utilize the information (and any other available materials) to update Maryville College's athletic programs through an independent study towards graduation requirements.

Is it needed? Stated simply, IT IS NEEDED.

out on less church-related issues, such as the INF treaty, which he opposed. He insisted that a U.S.-Soviet agreement should depend on, as quoted in Time, "a rollback, a decolonization if you will, of the Soviet Empire."

Robertson has promised to eliminate the budget deficit by 1991. One measure he would use is phasing out farm subsidies. He refuses to raise taxes.

His trade policy is based on tit-for-tat responses to other countries' trade barriers. In foreign policy, he supports Contra aid. In defense policy, he supports the SDI.

His domestic policy would include merit pay for teachers, elimination of the Department of Education, tougher child-support enforcement laws, and vouchers for job training and medical care for the poor.

Robertson's campaign, however, like many in 1988, depends less on issues than on image. He hopes to tap a populist vein that fueled the campaigns of other conservative populists such as Ronald Reagan; he aims for voters' resentments of the moderate-to-liberal powers-that-be.

His support is, in fact, drawn from a wide base, including not only fundamentalist and Pentacostal Christians, but also religious groups ranging from Roman Catholics to evangelicals to mainstream Protestants. One area of Robertson support is blue-collar ethnics who used to vote Democratic; Former Democrats for Robertson (FDR) was active in Iowa.

Robertson is charismatic and skillful at judging the amount and quality of his support; US News and World Reports quoted him as saying, "Getting nominated is really a matter of mathematics, and I'm the best equipped to win because I know better than anyone else where my supporters are."

Art exchange planned; FAC shows students' works

by Lissa McLeod

MC has a strong exchange program with students from other countries. This program allows both the visitors and the hosts to learn about each other and to share ideas.

Perhaps it is in this same spirit of shared ideas that the art club has engaged in an exchange program with Campbell College in Kentucky.

This month's art exhibit includes a diverse array of styles and techniques by various artists at Maryville. Next month's exhibit will be by the students at Campbell College, and Maryville's exhibit will travel to Kentucky.

February's show is probably the most diverse show of the year. Not only are some art majors' works displayed, but the exhibition also includes work by non-art majors who took art classes last fall. The show was open to anyone who had taken art classes and wanted to submit works.

The display includes drawings in charcoal, chalks, and pen and ink; prints with linoleum block and silkscreen; India ink wash paintings; and photographs.

The subjects are as diverse as the artists -- including still life, local scenes, and people -- and the scope of the works range from small pencil sketches to larger, full-size studies.

Art major Selena Dockery, whose works are included in the exhibit, suggested that the displayed works, especially those of art majors, may not be the best quality they are capable of. She said "Most of us kept our best works for senior shows and scholarship competitions in April. Both Jennifer Chastain and I will be displaying our best works later this spring in our senior exhibits. Other upperclassmen are looking forward to scholarship competitions."

Video releases worth second look

by Jennifer C. Worth

Two of the summer's biggest movies -- Dragnet and Robocop -- are on their way to the small screen. They're both worth making a trip to your local video store.

Dragnet, a hilarious spoof of the classic Jack Webb TV series, could have been just another dumb parody or one-joke failure. But, thanks largely to the chemistry between stars Dan Ackroyd and Tom Hanks, it succeeds as a clever parody of the

Even though the show might not contain all of the students' favorite works, it is a diverse mixture of techniques, media, styles, and subjects.

For many non-art majors, the show provides an opportunity to display works that might otherwise not have been displayed.

But, most importantly, the exchange exhibit will allow for MC students to learn from Campbell College's students and for them to learn from us.

With this anticipation, MC is looking forward to hosting Campbell College's exhibit in March.

original and as a comedy in its own right.

The plot's a little silly, but that's part of the fun. And the idea of an anti-Christian terrorist group (goat masks, virgin sacrifice, and all) is definitely topical in light of the various eggs on the face of organized religion.

Ackroyd's deadpan is perfect, and his impersonation is complete -- he's almost a better Jack Webb than Jack Webb. As the original Sergeant Friday's nephew, Ackroyd is ramrod

Marsalis gives Knoxville concert

by Beverly F. Hammond

To celebrate Black History Month, the Optimist Club of Mechanicsville-Lonsdale will present New Orleans jazz pianist Ellis Marsalis with the Ellis Marsalis Quartet at the Tennessee Theatre on February 19 at 8:00 p.m. Marsalis is the father of Wynton and Branford Marsalis, two of the brightest stars on the jazz scene today.

A review of the album, Fathers and Sons, in the San Francisco Bay Guardian noted Ellis' multifaceted technique and focused composition, until now unheard outside of the crescent city; his skill helps us to understand how Wynton and Branford have been able to balance discipline and spontaneity at such early ages.

Downbeat Magazine describes Ellis Marsalis as a master of his art, having been at it both as a performer and a teacher for more years than most of us realize.

Ellis Marsalis has recently been heard on WUOT-FM with his own jazz program, "Milestones in Jazz," which is a survey of jazz history. His program explored decades crucial to the development of jazz, focusing on the players who forged particular styles.

Marsalis has a desire to teach the public about jazz and to educate jazz musicians. He said, "I think I can pull people into jazz. Jazz is the best-kept secret in the world when it comes to financial support. There just aren't many ways to get at jazz education unless you know musicians."

Marsalis has served as a member of the Jazz Panel of the National Endowment for the Arts, as an on-site evaluator for the National Endowment for the Arts, and as a member of the Music Presenters Panel.

He has been on the music faculty of Xavier University and Loyola University and is presently on the faculty at Virginia Commonwealth University. He is well known for his teaching ability and has trained such musicians as Terance Blanchard and Donald Harrison, as well as Wynton and Branford.

In addition to his teaching credentials, he has toured widely as a jazz musician. With a jazz quartet, he toured the Philippines, Malaysia, and New Zealand for the State Department. He has performed at the New Mexico Jazz Festival, The Caribbean Jazz Festival, and the New Orleans Jazz and Heritage Festival.

He has performed with Terance Blanchard, Woody Shaw, Al Hurt, Sara Vaughn, and Wynton Marsalis. He premiered his own composition Ballad for Jazz Trio and Symphony Orchestra with the New Orleans Symphony Orchestra in 1980 completed with a grant from the National Endowment for the Arts. He has also presented a solo piano recital at Carnegie Recital Hall which received good notice from New York Times reviewer Stephan Holden. Ellis Marsalis is one of the most respected jazz pianists performing today.

He has recordings to his credit, including one with his sons, Wynton and Branford, and one with Branford which contains some of his own compositions.

Tickets to the concert are available at all Proffitt's stores and in Knoxville at the UT Central Ticket Office, Carriage Dry Cleaners, and College Pharmacy. Tickets will be available at the box office the evening of the concert.

Tickets are $12.50, with proceeds from the concert benefiting the Adopt-a-Student Scholarship Program of the Optimist Club.

Among the memorable supporting characters are Dabney Coleman as a porn mogul, and Christopher Plummer as the hypocritical evangelist who wants to reform L.A. (or does he?)

Robocop, the summer's surprise smash, is a very different film and, in its own way, perhaps a better one.

'Great decisions' planned

from the Communications Office

Maryville College's World Concerns Committee is sponsoring a February-March lecture/study series based upon the booklet, "Great Decisions 1988."

The series consists of eight sessions to be held on Tuesdays from 12:15 to 1:00 p.m. in the Proffit Dining Room of Pearsons Hall. The public is invited to attend.

"Great Decisions 1988" was prepared by the Foreign Policy Association, a non-partisan organization, whose purpose has been to help Americans gain a better understanding of significant issues in U.S. foreign policy and stimulate constructive and informed citizen participation in world affairs.

On February 2, Dr. Elizabeth Perez-Reilly, professor of Spanish, spoke on "Mexico and the U.S.: Agenda '88." On February 9, Dr. Scott Brunger, professor of economics, spoke on "Trade and Markets: Risks and Opportunities." And on February 16, Dr. Young-Bae Kim, professor of political science, spoke on "The Soviet Union: Gorbachev's Reforms."

The dates, topics, and remaining speakers are as follows: February 25, "U.S. and the Middle East: Dangerous Drift," by Khaled Irar, student from Jordan; March 1, "The Global Environment: Reassessing the Threat," by Terry Bunde, professor of chemistry; March 8, "South Korea: the Future of Democracy," by Dr. Young-Bae Kim; March 15, "Western Europe: Between the Superpowers," by Trond Skogseth, student from Norway; and March 29, "U.S. Foreign Policy: Projecting U.S. Power," by Steve Ledman, a student in economics.

Lew Rudisill, MC's director of Camps and Conferences, is in charge of the use of MC facilities by off campus groups or individuals.

Want to rent an MC facility? Ask Rudisill

by Nancy Oberholtzer

Do you remember all those kids running around in sheets last spring? Did you wonder who they were and where they came from? They were part of the State Junior Classical League Convention, and they came from Lew Rudisill.

Rudisill is the current director of Camps and Conference on campus. She is the first to hold this position, which was previously under the Office of Community Services. She began this job under the Development Office in November 1986.

When asked to describe her position, Rudisill said, "Any off-campus group or individual who wants to use campus facilities comes through my office."

She expanded by saying, "That includes the use of the Wilson Chapel Theatre Complex, the Fine Arts Center, Willard House, as well as the pool and any athletic facilities."

She also manages Pearsons Hall. That entails all guest housing and all student housing during holidays. Students who have visitors from out of town should check with Rudisill about accommodations. Arrangements can be made to put visitors up in Pearsons, which would probably be cheaper than a hotel.

Rudisill said, "Of course, the biggest part of my job is the summer program. That includes all band camps, athletic camps, and many smaller conferences, such as the Blue Ridge Environmental Defense League."

According to Rudisill, the most interesting group she has dealt with is the Japanese women college students who visited here last summer and will return this coming summer. They are from Mejiro Gakuen Women's College in Tokyo.

Much of the business of the Camps of Conferences Office is aimed at promoting MC public relations, but it also pays well. According to Rudisill, the average charge for a group to rent the chapel is $200 per day, $150 per day for the theatre, and $100 per day for the music hall. This does not include rehearsal days, which are charged according to what technical equipment is used and whether maintenance and security are required.

Money tops survey

(OCR) -- More college freshmen than ever before place a high priority on being financially well off and being in charge of others in the workplace, according to the 22nd annual Survey of College Freshmen.

Conducted by the American Council on Education and UCLA's Higher Education Research Institute, the survey of 290,000 freshmen reported that 75 percent identify financial success as being one of their essential goals in life. In contrast, only 39 percent of 1970 freshmen named this priority.

Many see education as a way to achieve this top goal: 71 percent said that a key reason in their decision to attend college was to make more money.

Along with money, a

Lady Scots tennis gears up for season

by Lisa Harvey Linginfelter

Dr. David Cartlidge, Lady Scots tennis coach, has high hopes for the 1988 season.

Although last year's 6-4 dual meet record will be tough to top, Cartlidge said, "We should be able to do so, if the team plays to its capabilities."

Cartlidge mentioned that this year's squad should be stronger than last year's, but also that the conference will be stronger, specifically "Rhodes, Centre, and Sewanee, who had very strong young teams in 1987." One reason that this year's MC team will be tough is that there will be "a strong intrasquad rivalry for positions on the team."

The 1988 Lady Scots include four letter-winners from last year's team: Raina Boring, who played the number one position; Becky Shackelford, number two;

Lisa Harvey Linginfelter, number four; and Teresa Pettit, number six.

In addition, two other letter-winners are returning to the team. Pam Gunter returns after two years' absence, while Julie Dodd Ramsey returns after one year. Gunter played the number two position in 1985, while Ramsey played number three in 1986. New team members include freshmen Lynn Burgin, Ann Beaty, and Debbie Clinton, and transfer student Mikako Oe.

The Lady Scots will travel to Milligan College on March 5 for the season opener, but will return to Maryville March 10 to battle arch-rival Sewanee.

The Lady Scots are also hosting the Women's Intercollegiate Athletic Conference (WIAC) tournament this year, on May 6-7, and they hope that the campus will actively support the team.

Ferrin discusses budget at football meeting

by Jennifer C. Worth

"I'm committed to the quality of a total program at Maryville College. That includes football, but it also includes the whole program," said President Richard Ferrin at a football players' meeting on February 10.

The football team and the Athletic Department as a whole have been feeling the squeeze of a tight budget. Athletic Director Randy Lambert said, "The Athletic Department, like all departments, is limited for the time being."

Ferrin expressed a similar idea at the meeting, saying, "The budget is stretched very tight throughout the whole institution."

Next year's football budget, part of the budget plan that Ferrin will propose to the Board of Directors in April, will see a $2,000 increase over last year's, for a total of $32,000. The Athletic Department is one of the two MC departments to receive a funding increase.

In addition, the football program will receive $5,000 from the Scots' Club fundraising, but this sum will have to be spent for equipment.

MC's financial aid package for next year, already approved by the Board on January 14, is $398,000 in grant aid. Eighty percent of MC students, most of whom are involved in some branch of athletics, receive financial aid.

Ferrin plans to add more sports to MC's roster, such as track and field, women's soccer, varsity men's tennis, and golf. When some players questioned the creation of new programs when existing ones are struggling, Ferrin replied, "They [new sports] relate to enrollment factors.... It helps us all in the long run."

Lambert concurred, saying, "More enrollment increases the pie, so each department gets a bigger piece."

Ferrin promised that football would not suffer from the additions.

One project in the works is a new roof for one end of the HPER building. The weight room leaks, and a roof renovation is needed. The cost to restructure the entire roof would be $108,000; Ferrin is awaiting the final estimate for just the portion and expects it to cost around $30,000. Money from a land sale will fund the renovation.

Further down the road, Ferrin hopes to more fully renovate MC's athletic facilities. He is launching a fundraising drive to upgrade the stadium, renovate the exterior and interior of the HPER building, add more tennis courts, and build a track. Ferrin's goal for this project is three years.

Assistant coaches' salaries have been restructured. Since assistant coaches will no longer house in Pearsons Hall, a room-and-board adjustment will be added into their pay. The new head football coach will have a total of $44,000 to hire and pay assistant coaches.

Ferrin said, budget limitations or no, "It is not my intention to discontinue football." He stressed, "I clearly see the football program as part of the overall program."

Campuses protest Israel

(CPS) -- Students at five more American campuses protested Israel's violent response to Palestine uprisings on the West Bank of the Jordan River and in the Gaza Strip.

Initiated by Arab organizations like the General Union of Palestinian Students, groups ranging in size from 12 to 150 people staged rallies at the universities of Idaho, Washington, Arizona, and at Washington State and Western Michigan universities the last week of January.

They called for the establishment of a Palestinian state and an end to U.S. "financing of terrorism," a reference to the American military aid to Israel.

To quell the rioting on the West Bank and in the Gaza Strip, which Israel has occupied since 1967, Israeli troops periodically have used live ammunition, killing more than 45 people.

SHORTS

(OCR) -- College athletes who didn't graduate but later decide to return to school will be eligible for scholarships under a special nine million dollar fund set up by the National Collegiate Athletic Association. One source of money, officials say, will be the lucrative TV contract the NCAA signed for the next three national college basketball tournaments.

(OCR) -- Once again, the "Dance Cats," a dance group that entertains during halftime at University of Kentucky men's basketball games, is drawing criticism for its choice of costume. So many complaints about the uniform -- skin-tight, long-sleeved royal blue leotards -- have been recorded that officials have now banned the uniform. Last year, the dancers caused a similar stir when they wore one-piece unitards. What'll they wear now? "As long as we cover our behinds, we're all right," says one dance troupe member.

(OCR) -- OLD SPORT, NEW GAME: The first National Collegiate Championship of the American Croquet Association was held recently in Massachusetts. The game is gaining in popularity because it requires a combination of thinking and coordination skills. Tournament-style croquet uses equipment somewhat different from that used in the backyard variety -- longer mallets, larger balls of plastic resin, and iron wickets only 1/8" wider than the new balls.

(OCR) -- CHEAP SLEEP: American Youth Hostels has opened a new 250-bed facility in the heart of Washington, D.C. Guests can stay at the hostel for only ten dollars per person, per night. For information, contact: Hostel Manager, Department PR, Washington International AYH-Hostel, 1009 11th St. NW, Washington, D.C. 20013-7613; Phone: 202/737-2333. For information on other American Youth Hostels, write: AYH, Dept. 853, P.O. box 37613, Washington, D.C. 20013-7613.

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Discounted admission tickets to area movie theatres: Consolidated Theatres, Inc. will sell to MC blocks of tickets at a discounted rate. These tickets would be good for admission at Foothills Cinema, in Foothills Plaza, Maryville, and Kingston Four, on Kingston Pike in Knoxville.

The discounted ticket price would be $2.75; regular nighttime prices are $4.50 and $4.75. These tickets would be sold in the College Bookstore. Any MC student or employee would be eligible to buy the discounted tickets for themselves or for relatives and friends.

NOTE: occasionally a film company (especially of specialty films, such as the Billy Graham company) will prohibit the use of discount tickets.

Watch for the tickets to go on sale!

Members of the Department of Languages and Literature -- Arthur Bushing, Charlotte Beck, Elizabeth Perez-Reilly, and Susan Schneibel -- will attend the annual meeting of the Tennessee Philological Association at David Lipscomb College February 25-27. Beck will present a paper entitled "The Fugitive Legacy's Appalachian Strain: Jesse Stuart and James Still," which was prepared when she was a James Still Fellow at the University of Kentucky-Lexington during the summer of 1986.

CORRECTION: In last issue's printing of the Dean's List, Thomas Scott was inadvertently named among the third-year students; he should have been on the list of fourth-year students.

The Maryville College community contributed $180 to the purchase of cows, sheep, goats, rabbits, chicks, and bees through the Heifer Project International.

Contributors received holiday cards, buttons, and Christmas ornaments representing the animals they purchased. These animals will be sent by Heifer Project International to poor farmers around the world to breed with local livestock in order to improve their herds and flocks. Farmer recipients then give the firstborn to another poor farmer to multiply the gifts.

During Interim 1987 a team of students worked at the Heifer Project farm in Arkansas. Among them, Charlie Thompson and Chris Lilley helped with fund raising. Lori Smith and Scott Brunger arranged the table with animal sound accompaniment on December 10 and 14 outside the dining hall.

Students and faculty purchased a goat in honor of Dean Boldon. He was speechless when he received it.

The World Concerns Committee raised $53.70 for the Fred Hope Fund established in memory of a Maryville College graduate who served as a Presbyterian missionary in Cameroon, Central Africa. The money will be sent to help the work of two 1985 MC graduates, Ed and Gloria Welch, who teach in a Presbyterian high school in Lesotho, Southern Africa.

Steve Ledman, Jonathan Allison, Dr. Scott Brunger, and Dr. David Yu helped in fund raising.

Ed and Gloria Welch expect to return to the United States in February 1988 to continue their education.

Movies from p.5

I didn't expect much from Robocop: just another no-guts-no-glory time-waster. I was wrong, and I went back to see it again.

This movie has style, and lots of it. It's as slick as a music video, and the scenes are shot with a deftness that makes the film very watchable. The switches from objective camera-eye to Robocop's viewpoint to, occasionally, TV commercials work well, giving the film an interesting perspective and a strong visual impact.

Style, however, is not enough for a movie, and Robocop also has substance, namely biting satire of TV, of big business, of law enforcement, and, in a subtler sense, of the movie-making industry itself. The whole movie has a "Look,

Ma, I made a movie" feel, as if the production staff just got together and decided to throw together some car chases on film. (How different from the tortuous production path of ill-starred Ishtar!)

Robocop is gory and violent, true. But the violence seems thrown in self-consciously and not to be taken seriously, like cartoon violence. It's almost camp.

Robocop isn't exactly good, clean fun. But it is fun.

Survey from p.6

record number also want power. Seventy-seven percent said they wanted to have authority in their chosen fields, and close to half want administrative responsibility for the work of others.

Like last year's group of freshmen, many plan to major in education (8 percent, compared to 7.4 percent in 1986) and are losing interest in engineering, computing, and nursing.

As for the most popular major, it's business, as usual. Nearly 25 percent of freshmen say they plan to pursue business careers, and many more of them are women: 22 percent of freshmen women are business majors.

Most of those surveyed eventually want someone to share their lives with. A new item added to the survey this year indicated that 60 percent of the 1987 freshmen identify marriage as an essential life goal.

Alcohol, representation spark debate

by Lynn King

Only time will tell whether the dry campus proposal will still be a major issue by the time the Echo goes to press, but the impending change in policy has been the object of much controversy during the last week.

Rumors concerning the change in the alcohol policy abounded by the time the campus community was officially made aware of it, leading some to comment upon the impossibility of forming intelligent, informed opinions on the matter.

"It's a topic of concern surrounded by a great deal of confusion," junior Liz Stine said, referring to the numerous variations of the story to be heard on campus.

President Richard I. Ferrin addressed the Student Senate meeting regarding this issue on Thursday, Feb. 25, trying to dispell some of the confusion for the approximately 150 students attending.

According to Ferrin, the alcohol issue came before the MC Board of Directors at the January meeting, at which time the decision was made to move toward a dry campus policy. The action officially reads, "By motion duly made and seconded, the Board approved the concept of a no-alcohol policy and authorized the administration to develop a specific policy."

A special task force comprising students, faculty, staff, and administration will be organized to develop a specific policy to be enforced beginning next school year. The projected date of completion for this policy is the April meeting of the Board of Directors.

Chairing the task force will be Dr. Harry Howard, chairman of the Department of Social Sciences. The remainder of the task force consists of Carolyn Cuddy, professor of Business Administration; Dr. Robert Ramger, professor of Biology; sophomore Jon Allison; junior Wendi Jo Medlin; junior Kristi Self; Bruce Guillaume, director of the Life Enrichment Center; Phil Neddo, head soccer coach; and Jane Richardson, dean of students.

Independent of their reactions to the elimination of alcohol on campus, many students were concerned about what they construed to be lack of student representation on this issue. "I was more upset about the fact that the concept was formed without student representation than that the campus is going to be dry," senior Susan Richards said.

Junior Denise Wilson Franklin concurred: "I think there should have been more student representation. It affects us directly; we ought to at least know what's going on."

In answer to the representation question, Ferrin said that student input on this issue will come within the context of formulation and implementation of a specific alcohol policy. He stated further that while an action such as this one is within the parameters of the Board's authority, he does not believe students should be concerned that this will become a precedent for similar proceedings.

A number of suggestions were made at the meeting regarding possible approaches to increased student input, among them the proposal for a student liaison with the Board of Directors in some form or another. Ferrin said that he will be highly supportive of such a move: "I am in favor of a system that allows for the student voice to be heard and taken seriously."

After the meeting, Ferrin conferred with Board Chairman Harwell Proffitt and with Student Senate President DeAnn Hargis. Several procedures have been established to enable direct communication between the Board and students: an allotted time at the fall and spring Board meetings when the Student Senate president can make a presentation, sessions involving Student Senate officers and members of the Board's Student Affairs Committee, and conversations between students and the Board members.

Another action taken at the January Board meeting which received less attention than the alcohol policy will allow students to live off campus at the age of 21, as opposed to the current age limit of 23, beginning next year. "From the Board of Directors' point of view, it's an eminently logical solution," junior Darrell Franklin commented, continuing that as anyone of legal drinking age dissatisfied with the alcohol policy will now be free to move elsewhere, "It's a trade-off."

Ferrin also addressed the age question, pointing out that 78 percent of students now living on campus are under 21, so MC is simply complying with state law in eliminating the problem of an environment previously conducive to drinking under the legal age limit.

Director of Communications Emily C. Yarborough commented, "I don't see why it should be such a major issue, due to the fact that the majority of our students are under the legal drinking age."

Will the new policy have an adverse effect on recruiting? Ferrin doesn't think so. "I can't imagine anyone making the decision to come to Maryville College based upon what our alcohol policy has been," he said, continuing, "I think this will have a positive effect on enrollment."

What immediate effect will the new policy have on life at Maryville College? "My belief is that we will be a healthier institution. Right now, alcohol becomes the center of any discussion of social events," Ferrin said, adding that he believes the removal of this question will have a positive effect upon campus social life. "We as an

AAUW presents funds

from the Communications Office

The Blount County chapter of the American Association of University Women (AAUW) presented a $500 scholarship donation to Maryville College.

The local branch of AAUW has given a scholarship donation to Maryville College for the last four years. The money is made possible by the club's Book Fair, which is its annual fund raising event.

This year's Book Fair will be held March 15-16 in the Community Room of Blount County Library.

AAUW is the oldest and largest national organization working for academic and educational equity for women. Its Educational Foundation provides funds to American and international women for study and research. Maryville College graduate Nathalia Wright was the recipient of one of the Educational Foundations scholarships.

Mrs. Archibald (Mary Gladys) Pieper is president of the Blount County AAUW.

Avoid Political apathy; it matters!

The far-off phenomenon of the '88 presidential campaign is coming to Tennessee in full force on March 8; we hope that everyone on campus will take time to find out as much as possible about the four Republican and the six Democratic candidates and make a special effort to be involved in the last and perhaps most important leg of the race.

Apathy is, unfortunately, as common among the national electorate as on the MC campus. Most Americans tend to ignore what goes on in the capital until something goes wrong and then, when it is too late, wonder, "Why doesn't anyone do anything?" That's the wrong attitude.

With classes, homework, extracurricular activities, and even, lately, campus politics, it's hard to always find the time to keep up with national politics. But if you've got time to keep up with your "soaps" or to follow the 76-ers' season, then you've got the time for this.

And anyone who says, "Politics is boring," obviously hasn't been following this campaign!

Months before the final vote, check around. Are you eligible to vote locally? If not, send in an absentee ballot. A few votes won't make that much difference, but a few hundred might. And if everyone, not just at MC but nationwide, took the advice, then the "hundreds and thousands of additional votes would be a force to be reckoned with."

Think about how stirred up most of you became over the dry campus issue. We need that same energy and interest to government on broader levels.

Government should not legislate morals

The purpose of our government, in its lowest common denominator, is, perhaps, to keep order, to balance the rights and privileges of one group against those of another group. Obviously, compromises are necessary, but the basic freedom must not be forgotten or ignored.

Therefore, it is not the job of our government on any level to legislate morality.

By the same token, drinking should be illegal only when it involves an infringement. Drunk driving and "drunk and disorderly conduct" are two ways that drinking can lead to a disruption of other people's lives.

But the act of drinking should not be seen in the same light; any law which wholesale prevents adults' drinking is being paternalistic and moralistic. This applies to government on any level, from federal to campus.

We hope that President Ferrin and the Board had some other, non-paternalistic, motivation behind the dry campus issue. If so, we encourage them to let us know, but we suspect that a societal abhorrence of alcohol, even in its most innocuous forms, is at the heart of the decision.

Student challenges alcohol policy

Editor, Highland Echo:

At the student senate meeting last Thursday, the students got a chance to ask Dr. Ferrin about the dry campus decision that the Board of Directors made. Apparently, the Board is to make Maryville College a dry campus starting next year.

Dr. Ferrin admitted that it was on his initiative the board acted. At a CCM meeting last year, a student asked Ferrin if he would make the campus dry; he said he had "no" intentions. However, he brought this issue to the Board. Also at the senate meeting Ferrin denied he had said "no" about a dry campus. According to Ferrin, the state law on drinking states that only those 21 years and older may purchase, possess, or consume alcohol, and Maryville College adheres to this law; however, Ferrin went on to say, "Our present policy encourages underaged drinking, and Maryville College is a haven for alcohol." If this is true, then the entire state is a haven; this is not a sound statement in my judgement, but a personal opinion.

Another contradiction in Ferrin's argument was the origin of complaints about the drinking problem. Ferrin was extremely ambiguous on the source of his information. He said it came from "concerned students and parents of prospective students."

As to the solution, no one was consulted. To ask around about a problem, but not to ask around for any

STUN succeeds

Editor, Highland Echo:

By now we have all heard about the change in MC's alcohol policy and the controversy surrounding it. I have heard many comments referring to the two STUN (Student Unification) meetings as "stupid" and several different comments regarding the Student Senate meeting. Most of these were unmentionable, but one student expressed her frustration by saying of the Student Senate meeting, "Absolutely nothing was accomplished!"

I attended both STUN meetings and I thought the goals and ideas expressed there were good, but not necessarily realistic. I also attended the Student Senate meeting, and I have to say that I disagree with my friend's comment. I can see two very important accomplishments of that meeting.

Because of Dr. Ferrin's comments to both the student senators and other interested students, we all have a clearer understanding of how the college government works. We all know how much power our Student Senate actually has. We also have a more accurate idea of exactly how important our ideas and insights are to both our President and the Board of Directors.

Residence Staff: not for everyone

by Andi Bristol

The application process for those wishing to serve on the residence hall staff is underway. As a present staff member, I have been asked by several people who are interested in the position, "What is the job like?" and "Do your friends treat you differently?"

The answer to the second question is yes, your friends will probably treat you differently. But that isn't a bad thing. The most noticeable way that I have been treated differently by my friends is that they don't always tell me what is going on (especially when it involves breaking the rules). My not knowing, however, keeps me from being put in a bad position -- nobody likes to write anyone up, especially when you're dealing with your friends.

The first question is more difficult. As an SA (staff assistant) I have a lot of responsibilities, the least of which is policing the dorms. I have a responsibility to help ensure that the atmosphere in the dorm is conducive to healthy, peaceful living.

On a more personal level, another responsibility is that I be a peer counselor. This position requires that I have good listening skills, compassion, and the ability to recognize when a problem is too great for me to handle on my own.

I take these responsibilities seriously, therefore it disturbs me when I hear people talking about applying for the position only for the privilege of a private room.

The job requires a lot of dedication; if a person has applied for any other reason than a true desire to do the job well, then that person should withdraw his application. A person of this caliber would not handle the job well, anyway.

Being on staff is not for everyone, but if you are truly interested in being a leader and doing the job well, then good luck to those of you who applied. If you are one of those persons who has applied so that you can have your own room (granted that is meant as an incentive) then please reconsider. Are you sure that you really want the job and all that it entails?

Parking angers student

Editor, Highland Echo:

Although I respect this college and the education I am receiving here, there is one area of this campus that really fires me up.

For some reason, the college security and the Traffic Committee seem to have nothing better to do than harass students with cars on campus. During the past month, I have seen many students' cars being towed away without their owners. Is this really fair? To me, this college takes enough away from students without taking their possessions.

Once again, I stress that most students are here because they want to be here, but the college is really taking advantage of this!

O.K., one should not park in a no-parking zone; point taken. However, campus security, don't you have anything better to do than stir up angry feelings and harass car owners? Traffic Committee, why don't you quit ticketing people and start using your heads to create fewer "no-parking" zones and "reserved" spots and create more parking for us common students. Think about it. You are making more than one person angry.

Sincerely
M. Leigh Emery

The judge denied a preliminary injunction requested by the Civil Liberties Union on behalf of a student who objected to prayers as part of the ceremony. The student contended that the prayers violate his constitutional rights and asked them to be stopped. student input when the whole thing started, in part, from student input seems sketchy. The fact that the decision was made in the January Board meeting (during interim) behind our backs, shows our president's attitude towards the students. What's next, I ask?

To continue the string of contradictory and statements of our leader, he quoted 200,000 deaths on our highways every year, by putting drinking off campus he is not helping the drunk driving issue much, but it somehow makes sense to him.

Even though you pay for your rooms, and the dorm is your home for nine months, Ferrin is going to regulate drinking in your home.

I propose a look at the Prohibition. It is a proven, documented fact that laws aimed at stopping drinking encourage drinking, and thus breaking the law. Perhaps something may be learned from history!

Also, let's look at the

A number of students commented optimistically on attendance at the Student Senate meeting and at student unification meetings, expressing hope that students will continue to work together and take an active interest in other areas involving the MC campus community as a whole.

The second accomplishment is a direct product of the first. It is a change in the attitude of a large number of students on this campus. I suppose that the Office of Student Life will no longer send observers into student meetings to keep our "youthful idealism" and enthusiasm from getting out of hand.

However, I doubt that either of these things will be extensively manifested on this campus at all for a long time. sincerely, alcohol problem itself. Drinking and alcohol in itself is no problem; it is the people who have the problem with alcohol. One cannot remove the alcohol -- one must deal with the problem. When there is no drinking problem, there is no problem. Apparently Ferrin either cannot or will not deal with a problem, but he can deal with the cause -- the easy way out!

Speaking of the easy way out, Ferrin, through the Board, has made the decision for all students over 21. Since most of the students are under 21, banning alcohol is indeed the easy way out. If Ferrin had real initiative, he could really deal with the problem and not step on the students 21 and over.

I came to MC to get a "liberal arts education" Nestled in the foothills of the Smoky Mountains in an "enviable environment," Maryville College encourages and challenges students to think for themselves -- but, alas, no more, at least not on this issue.

In conclusion, I would like to say that I drink but very little. I am very much in favor of the right of anyone to choose for him- or herself alone, not for any authority which feels it has the right to decide for people. I am 26 years old, and I have spent four years serving my country overseas in the U.S. military. For me, anyone who makes a decision for me without consulting me or without looking for other alternatives is in a direct conflict with me.

I consider this decision a personal affront. I am old enough, adult enough, and responsible enough to drink in moderation. I challenge Dr. Ferrin, the president of my campus -- in charge of my education -- to make a just and agreeable policy about drinking on campus.

He said, "Students didn't elect that group [the Board]." But we did elect to go to this school. It was a decision made by us -- not for us, and I think it showed responsible thinking. Don't you? At least so far.

Sincerely,
Dan Fox

THE CANDIDATES

by Jennifer C. Worth

Jackson seen as 'kingmaker'

Jesse Jackson's position in the Democratic field is most unusual. With practically no political experience but a considerable following, this preacher may prove to be a "kingmaker" at the Democratic National Convention.

Democratic consultant Bob Beckel told newsweek "The Jackson factor looks very large . . . He's far stronger now than in 1984."

Jackson's image is that of a champion of the underprivileged, socially and economically; his platform reinforces this image. He would increase tax rates for corporations and for the wealthy. He would expand welfare programs to encompass education, training, job counseling, and day care; he also favors increased spending for preschool educational programs, such as Head Start. He opposes protectionism on the grounds that it infringes on the rights of workers all over the world.

His plans for the budget include a slashing of Hart taps public's resentment of media

by Jennifer C. Worth

One of the most recognizable names from the 1988 election is Gary Hart, the "dark horse" who gave Walter Mondale a run for his money in 1984. This time, Hart's name has been more often linked to scandal.

His recent campaign has mainly aimed at tapping resentment of the big-time media and "the Establishment." In the matters of Hart's alleged affair with Donna Rice, the issue that initially caused him to withdraw from the race, and, to a lesser extent, his campaign debts and contributions, Hart has been the center of media attention, mostly unfavorable; he presents himself as a victim of the rapacious press.

This underdog image was his primary asset in 1984 (ironically, the media helped create this image and were, in large part, responsible for his meteoric rise among the rest of the Democratic field); he is no doubt hoping it will prove so again.

His campaign slogan stresses this image of Hart: "Let the people decide." In December, he told the Des Moines Register, "If opinion makers continue to beat up on me, we'll see what the effect of that is on the people."

Hart has tried to force campaign attention away from the character issue and onto the issues. But his

Tracing the '88 campaign

by Jimmy Simerly

Election '88: what have been the ups and downs? How will it all turn out? These simple questions defy simple answers.

The fact that characterizes this election year is that the "downs" definitely outweigh the "ups." Even at this early stage in the race, there have been enough scandals, mud-slinging, backbiting, and accusations to make the American public wonder if any of the Presidential candidates are worthy of the office.

The first, perhaps foremost, downward slide for election '88 took place when Gary Hart's liaison with Donna Rice was made public last year. The ensuing onslaught of questions directed to Hart by the news media stretched, if not broke, the etiquette boundary between those in the public eye and those probing into candidates' private lives supposedly for the benefit of the American people.

Not to be left out of the spotlight, Senator Joseph Biden of Delaware stirred up some controversy of his own, though it was not enough to match Hart's allegedly adulterous affair with Rice. Careful observers of Biden's speeches said that some of his words sounded much too familiar to have been his own. Careful research of various famous speeches proved that Biden was guilty of plagiarism. Additional research showed that Biden had also lied about his ranking in his law school graduating class.

Unlike Hart, however, Biden dropped out of the race not to rejoin it. What is somewhat foreboding is that these controversies were a mere prelude to the events occurring now.

Republican candidates George Bush and Robert Dole are openly hostile to one another in televised debates. In light of the recent revelation of TV evangelist Jimmy Swaggart's involvement with a prostitute, Pat Robertson's group has accused Bush's staff people of planting the evidence to damage Robertson's credibility, since he, too, is a television evangelist.

Surprisingly, most of those candidates in the middle of the controversies are still in the race. Not surprising, however, is the fact that many of the "quiet" candidates have dropped out simply for the lacking adequate voter support and/or funding.

Paul Simon, for example, called a press conference to announce that he does not have the funds to continue his campaign; he is, for now, hanging on.

When these "downs" of election '88 are taken into account, does it even seem that it has an "up" side? For the candidates, yes. For the American voting public, it is entirely a matter of opinion. According to Congressional Quarterly, Richard Gephardt won for the Democrats and Robert Dole won for the Republicans in the Iowa caucuses, the first major step in the nominating process.

Presently, though, all remaining candidates are gearing up for Super Tuesday on March 8. According to Dr. Young-Bae Kim, professor of political science, either Jesse Jackson or Michael Dukakis has a good chance of taking the Democratic nomination. Kim cited the facts that Dukakis has done well so far in the primaries and that Jackson could do well in the South because of the relatively high black population.

As for the Republicans, Kim thought that Bush will do well on Super Tuesday because, as the vice president, he is more recognizable than other candidates. However, Kim also said that Robertson could do very well in the Bible Belt states and have a surprising victory.

Campaign commentary:
Media, politics: The reporter's role

by Joanne Lax-Farr

The 1988 presidential campaign news coverage will be remembered by the way in which the press probed into personal closets of candidates and discovered the skeletons of sex, plagiarism, and pot. Just who are the people behind these stories? Who is covering this campaign for the nations newspapers and what kind of coverage are they giving us?

Theoretically, it doesn't matter who the journalist is because reporters are supposed to be objective: to be able to separate facts from opinion. In reality, this supposition doesn't always hold true, for each reporter is likely to see a reality influenced by his or her unique set of cultural baggage.

In addition, newsmakers such as politicians and government officials are adept at stage managers setting the scene for a reality of their own making. It was in reaction to the subjectivity of World War I propaganda that the press first began the widespread use of bylines to acknowledge subjectivity as a factor in reporting.

Despite the press' realization of the inevitable role of subjectivity in news articles, the profession often goes to great lengths to reassure the public that its reporters aren't writing with a hidden agenda. One way this is accomplished is through the employment of codes of ethics which regulate a reporter's off-duty behavior. Working for a candidate's campaign would be an example of behavior prohibited in many newsroom codes.

Ironically, some of the articles in a newspaper which don't have a byline are some of the most opinionated. These are the editorials, which supposedly represent the views of the publisher but in practice usually represent the consensus of the editorial board.

Some newspapers endorse presidential candidates (for example, the Des Moines Register endorsed Senator Paul Simon in this year's Iowa caucus) -- a throwback to times when readers were more likely to turn to the editorial page of the newspaper to be advised which candidate to vote for.

The editorial page of the newspaper also includes articles by political columnists. When you read a column by James Kilpatrick, for instance, you know you are getting the viewpoint of a well-known conservative; on the other hand, you can read David Broder's column to learn the liberal stand. These political columnists are President Richard I. Ferrin addressed the Student Senate at the February 25 meeting to discuss the dry campus issue and other concerns.

MC apathy marks this election year

by Mike Wallace

At the pith of the '88 presidential election, the Maryville College campus has shown no involvement or concern about the candidates and the issues they represent. Even with Pat Robertson's controversial claim about Soviet missiles in Cuba and Vice-President George Bush's ties in the Iran-contra scandal, the campus has not raised a fist or expressed any point of view in relation to the candidates.

Why is there a lack of campus involvement in the election?

This question was asked of Dr. David Cartledge, professor of religion and philosophy. He felt that the problem is not only present at Maryville College, but also nationwide. "People in general are tired of all the excess hoopla that goes on," said Cartledge.

Having been a professor at MC since 1965, he added, "Over the decades there has been a general loss of faith in our culture's institutions."

Present-day politics don't create as much of an uproar as they did in the days of John F. Kennedy and Martin Luther King, Jr. Twenty years ago, issues such as Vietnam and civil rights provoked student demonstrations on many campuses throughout the nation. Today, these demonstrations seem to exist only in frames of old television footage.

But what about new faculty members? How do they feel about campus involvement towards the '88 election? Having just arrived this year, Theatre Director Frank Bradley felt that there is not as much interest from the student body as there should be.

Bradley went so far as to say, "The only relating remark I've heard on campus was when Art Simon [Bread for the World] uttered a reference to his brother's campaign." He added, "I would like to see more discussions among the students and the students looking into it further than to what good it can do for themselves."

Since most of the election's functions, such as caucuses and Republican and

Candidates prepare for Super Tuesday hurdle

by Jennifer C. Worth

They call it "Super Tuesday." In light of the fact that over 30 percent of the national convention delegates will be chosen in 20 states, perhaps US News and World Report's tag of "Mega-Super Tuesday" is more appropriate.

The Super Tuesday powerhouse is concentrated in the South, so candidates like Jesse Jackson and Albert Gore, Jr., are counting on impressive turnouts from their largely Southern followings.

Super Tuesday in its current form was born, in part, from Southern politicians' resentment of the dominance of the Iowa caucus and the New Hampshire primary, early decisions that often winnow out "dark horse" candidates, especially those who appeal primarily to this region.

Tom Murphy, the speaker of the Georgia House of Representatives and a chief backer of the plan to add more Southern states to the Super Tuesday roster, told US News and World Reports in 1986, "The South is tired of the Northern press saying who's going to be the next president."

The purposes of increasing Southern muscle on Super Tuesday include: increasing the number of Southern candidates, upping their chances of snaring a spot on the national ticket, influencing the nomination of candidates with "centrist" views more in line with Southern voters, encouraging candidates to pay sympathetic attention to such regional issues as the oil industry and farming, and to "steal the thunder" from earlier primaries and caucuses.

Opponents to a regional powerhouse primary charge that it will only make other states move their primaries earlier and perhaps lead to a national primary.

Charles Manatt, the Democratic debates, have been carried only by cable networks, such as CNN and C-SPAN, many students may be out of touch with the '88 election. This would be a reason for the lack of involvement. However, there are ways for the campus to seek knowledge, understanding, and its own stand from which to voice a political opinion.

former Democratic national chairman, told US News and World Reports that early primaries allow "too short a period for candidates to be tested and considered."

The Democrats will nominate a candidate from the currently widely-split field in Atlanta on July 18. Each candidate is hoping for a majority of 2,081 delegates; by March 9, 1,662 pledged delegates will have been chosen in 26 states and American Samoa.

Each state's number of Democratic delegates depends on its showing in the 1984 and 1986 presidential and congressional elections. There are also seven delegates for "Democratic Abroad" and three for American Samoa.

A key factor at the convention will be the "superdelegates," who will make up 15 percent of the delegates at the convention. These members of Congress, governors, members of the Democratic National Convention, and other experienced politicians are unpledged; that is, they are

Campaign commentary: Hype, rhetoric cloud election issues

by Joe Johnson

As sure as "Death and Taxes," another election is nearing. It seems this presidential election will be filled with so much hype and rhetoric that the average voter will probably confuse the national issues with the less important affairs which seem to be the front page story every day.

In most newspapers there are different front-runners selected by polls every two weeks. And in a time of delicate world relations with both friends and foes, we as voters cannot afford to be confused with meaningless issues.

There have been issues raised this election year, but they have been the wrong issues. The national media have exploited the past sex lives and the present social relationships of many presidential candidates, Democrat and Republican alike. The media have used this "muckraking" technique to do nothing more than sell subscriptions.

Most newspapers seem to be hindering the discussion of the most important topics before the presidential election. The proposed agenda on foreign affairs, budgeting, social welfare, and national defense has been overlooked for more sensationalistic "soap-opera" type issues.

There are three primary issues that deserve the attention of the candidates and the voters as we enter this election year. National defense is the first most important. The candidates for both parties should relay their proposed agenda to the public. Issues such as "Star Wars" (Strategic Defense Initiative) funding and the present delicate situation in Central America should be the primary discussion before November.

Secondly, the federal deficit should be discussed intensely. Presently, the United States has a 2.36 billion dollar deficit, and unless massive reductions in spending or increases in taxation take effect, this country will face the possibility of bankruptcy.

Lastly, I think the final issue that presidential candidates should discuss is social welfare. With the increasing number of people living and working past the age of 65, our social security program cannot afford to compensate every retired person in the future. Presidential candidates should offer either a total revamping or mention new ideas of funding the troubled social security system.

Each candidate for the presidency in 1988 should and must include these items on his national agenda. This country cannot afford to listen to the rhetoric that is presently being presented. I think the final responsibility of addressing the important issues rests with the candidates themselves. Any refusal of the candidates to address these important issues and many others not mentioned here could lead to failure as a responsible and informed democracy.

Our Town unites campus/community

MC

Theatre's spring production is officially under way, as Our Town begins rehearsals.

The production, which will involve both MC students and area theatre enthusiasts, will open April 22 and run April 23, 29, and 30.

MC students involved in Our Town are Jon Allison, as the Stage Manager; Frances Kay Ayers, as Emily Webb; Michelle Rudisill, as Julia Gibbs, Emily's loving mother-in-law; Murray Kosmin, as Charles Webb, Emily's father; Jennifer C. Worth, as Myrtle Webb, her mother; Noel Royer, as Rebecca Gibbs; Bill Householder, as the unhappy Simon Stimson; Dan Fox, as Howie Newsome; Matt Wayland, as Si Crowell; and Geoff Vinson, as Sam Craig.

Playing townspeople, cemetery residents, and audience members are Frank Schubert, Liz Prior, Lisa C. Lingelfelter, and Mike Wallace.

Off-campus actors include: Drew Ogle, as George Gibbs; Charles Bedoian as Dr. Gibbs, George's father; Jason H.

Green, as Wally Webb, Emily's brother; Hayes Centebar, as local gossip Mrs. Soames; George Centebar, as Joe Stoddard, the undertaker; John H. Wells as Constable Warren; and Sandy Clark, as Joe Crowell.

Completing the cast are Ruth Berry, Diane Robinson, Julia Cain, and Amanda Williams.

Dr. Richard Ferrin, MC president, will make a "cameo" appearance as Professor Willard.

Director Frank Bradley is pleased with the varied backgrounds of the cast members; he hopes that the campus-community aspect will enrich the play for cast, crew, and audience.

Most of the off-campus cast members auditioned for the experience, out of interest in working in a MC show, or because they enjoy the play.

Berry, a drama teacher at local William Blount High School, said of her decision to audition, "I want to do more with contemporary theatre." On the subject of MC Theatre, she added, "I have been pleased with the way MC is moving."

Bennett censures colleges for trendy, pop courses

(CPS) -- U.S. Secretary of Education William Bennett, long a critic of what and how colleges teach students, blasted campuses last week for approving faculty "trashing of Plato and Shakespeare" in favor of trendy courses that don't do students any good.

Speaking to the convention of the National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities -- a group representing private campuses around the U.S. -- in Washington, February 4, Bennett warned that "the serious voices are being drowned out by the trendy lightweights in our midst."

Many of the campus presidents assembled to hear the speech were angered.

"It wouldn't be a college," said George Drake, president of Grinnell College in Iowa, "unless we provided an arena where nonsense could be spoken, debated, and, conceivably, refuted."

American University President Richard Berendzen, while conceding many schools leave their curricula with nonclassical courses and that not all campus teachers always are erudite, noted, "there are even a few government officials who say foolish things. I think I heard one this morning."

While many college presidents vehemently disagreed with Bennett's

February 4 assertion that some courses don't belong on serious campuses, virtually every school in America apparently has offered classes that don't seem narrowly aimed at academic literacy.

Pomona College in California, for example, offers "Principles and Practice of Pagan Magic," taught by a real live witch.

One of the most popular courses at the University of Alabama was "Home Brewing World-Class Beer," until the state Alcoholic Beverage Control Board shut it down last year because it violated a Prohibition-era statute about home-brewing beer and wine.

In 1985, the University of New Haven offered "Introduction to Nuclear Weapons," a do-it-yourself course on how to build a nuclear bomb.

Cuyahoga Community College in Ohio is the place to be for aspiring disco owners: it offers classes on how to make it in the night club business, covering everything from lighting, sound, and video to marketing.

San Francisco State offers "The Bay Area Music Industry in Historical Perspective," a review of the Grateful Dead, Jefferson Airplane, and Blue Cheer.

But perhaps the class most likely to inspire Bennett's ire is offered through the University of Missouri's Adult Extension Program. "Advanced Class Cutting for the Over-Committed" guarantees no bells, no grades, no class. The course description advises students to just "put it on your calendar and don't go."

PETF focuses on domestic violence

by Lissa McLeod

The Peace Education Task Force (PETF) at MC will be addressing the issue of domestic violence during the month of March.

Domestic violence is an aspect of our society that is receiving increasing attention in the media and being discussed much more openly.

One specific form of domestic violence that is often dramatized by the media with such films as The Burning Bed is the battering of women. No community escapes this form of violence, including the small town of Maryville, Tennessee.

Many communities are responding with support and protection for women attempting to break the cycle of violence while also questioning the existence and effects of the violence.

One such response in Jackson from p.4

military spending; Time cites his proposed defense cuts as 75 million dollars (about 25 percent of the total military budget). Among the programs he would cut are the MX, Minuteman, and Trident (submarine) missiles.

On the revenue side of his "white paper," Jackson would consider a five-dollar oil import fee.

Like most of his party colleagues, Jackson supported the INF agreement. He would also allow research, but not deployment, of SDI.

Because of his limited experience and his political stance to the left of Maryville is Haven House. Haven House is a shelter for abused women and their children who are escaping the violence in their homes, often unable to flee with many of their basic material possessions.

Peggy Cantrell, director of Haven House, will be on campus Thursday, March 10, to discuss with any interested students domestic violence topics, including why such behavior exists in our society, the effects on women and children, why women stay in abusive situations, and the difficulties of reestablishment for women who leave the scene of domestic violence.

In addition to hosting Cantrell, the Peace Education Task Force will be collecting needed items for Haven House. Appropriately marked cardboard boxes will be in a lounge on each floor of ever moderate, most campaign observers agree that Jackson is not electable on a national scale. But with his potential to win 1,000 delegates at the convention, his influence may be instrumental in deciding the nominee. The other Democratic candidates are walking the thin line of befriend Jackson without seeming to kowtow.

Outside of presidential elections Jackson is best known for being president of PUSH (People United to Save Humanity), a group that tries to aid and educate the underprivileged. He has also been, as Fortune Magazine put it, a "freelance hostage negotiator."

dorm.

Items Haven House needs include paper products (toilet paper, paper towels, diapers), personal toiletries (toothpaste, toothbrushes, combs, brushes, shampoo), kids' and women's clothing (preferably comfortable clothing such as jeans), shoes (such as tennis shoes), linens, kids' toys and coloring books, and craft items.

While this list is fairly comprehensive, Cantrell stressed, "We can use just about anything anyone would want to give us."

If you are interested in or concerned about domestic violence issues and our response to them, mark your calendar for March 10 and drop something you no longer use or wear into the Haven House boxes. It is a painless way to address a very painful issue.

Baseball Scots start '88 season

by Craig Farmer

Once again the baseball season is upon us, and with Head Coach Ronnie Ramsey and Assistant Coach Ronnie Rayho, the season looks promising.

The team is made up of upperclassmen and freshmen who will play some key positions: Billy Banker, Matt Hannington, and Randy Hinton. Some other key players are Eric Etchinson, who was injured, but is back playing behind the plate, and Jason Harbison, who will play third base.

Harbison felt that the following factors will provide a really good year: "More pitchers, people who can hit with a consistent average, and the team being young and aggressive."

Ramsey said the freshmen will have to produce in order to have a good year. Returning players changing from dual positions to single positions is a strength for now and years to come, to allow players to excel in more than just one position.

When asked what sets MC apart from other teams, Ramsey said, "Everyone's going to be gunning for us because this is our last year in 'the ODAC.' A large part of the schedule will be played in Maryville, giving MC the home field advantage.

An important factor is getting the fan support for baseball and all athletics. Ramsey felt the fans pressure the other team when they made mistakes and support the Scots when they made a good play. He would like to see "better support from students and the community throughout the year."

Etchinson said that an important goal for him was to beat Lynchburg. He said, "There is no love loss between their team and ours." On the offensive side, Etchinson said that they have "proven hitters." Another goal for Etchinson is "to score one run per inning."

Ramsey ended the interview on a positive note by saying, "What we lack in experience, we make up for in hard work."

The rest of the team is Alfred Rietkerk, Jeff Catlett, Bobby Cochran, Bobby Pringle, Chuck Costello, Hank Snyder, Mike Whitmore, Mike Reid, and Davey Reed.

(OCR) -- The struggle for control of student editorial pages has spread to the University of Missouri, where school officials want to replace the Maneater's faculty-student editorial board with an administration-controlled committee. Students argue the committee would act as a censor and stifle editorial independence. The university maintains the new board would simply provide in-house critiques.

not chosen by the electorate to nominate any particular candidate. Congressional superdelegates will be chosen April 19 and 20.

The superdelegates were a strong force for Walter Mondale in 1984; this year, Time is calling them Richard Gephardt's "ace in the hole."

Republican delegates will nominate their candidate in New Orleans on August 15. The 2,277 delegates are made up of a base six per state, 14 each from the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico, and four each from Guam and the U.S. Virgin Islands; states are awarded additional delegates based on their support of the Republican presidential candidate in 1984 and congressional and gubernatorial candidates from 1984 to 1987.

The states holding primaries on March 8 are: Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Massachusetts, Mississippi, Missouri, North Carolina, Oklahoma, Rhode Island, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia.

Media from p. 4

veteran journalists who interpret political developments based on many years of watching the American political scene.

The heyday of influential political columns was the 1930s; they were another important acknowledgment that facts were little more than individually crafted interpretations of reality.

Another type of newspaper hybrid is the analysis story, which combines the attribute of an opinion piece with the factual base of a "straight" news story. These articles may be found on the front page with the other news stories, but they are always clearly labeled so the reader will be aware of the blend of fact and interpretation in store for him or her. These stories generally contain the byline of a particular reporter, someone who has the experience and knowledge to put complex facts into perspective (such as analyzing the effects of Senator Al Gore's decision to forego the Iowa caucus) but not necessarily someone whose name is widely known.

But how objective is this news? Wire service stories may be shoddily or deliberately edited at local papers in a manner which affects the objectivity of the articles content. During the 1984 campaign, one of my students at Knoxville College discovered major differences between the same wire service story concerning Jesse Jackson appearing in one of the Knoxville newspapers and in the Atlanta Constitution.

When you read a newspaper for campaign coverage (or any other reason, for that matter) in the future, pay attention to what type of article you are reading. If, for instance, you just want straight information about something such as Pat Robertson's premarital sexual experience, stick to articles found in the front section of the newspaper. If you want to know someone's opinion about how it will affect his "hidden army" of supporters, then turn to the editorial pages.

Hart from p. 4

platform remains nebulous and lacking in detail. As Newsweek reports, Hart tends to use such terms as "strategic investment in the economy" and "military reform."

On the economy, Hart has said that he would be willing to raise taxes to fight the budget deficit. Like the other Democratic candidates, he supports arms negotiations and the limited use of U. S. military force overseas.

Immediately after the end-of-the year reentry, his name-recognition factor pushed him to the top of the polls. Now, his campaign volunteers are college students, who sympathize with Hart's brash stance.

Campaign observers see as Hart's main stumbling block the question of his electability. Most of the electorate seems to be still concerned about character, and the politics of resentment is usually a shaky matter.

(OCR) -- Twelve long-haired male students were pulled out of line during pre-registration at Florida Southern College last week. The students were told they couldn't sign up for spring classes unless they cut their hair during Christmas break. Those who promised to visit a barber were allowed to register. But several said they would rather switch than cut their long locks. One official of the Methodist college said, "We're trying to train students for life after college. ... There'll always be slight adjustments that have to be made to do things they want to do."

Cast from p. 6

George and Hayes Centebear were instrumental in establishing area community theatre, the Blount County Summer Playhouse, years ago; both are looking forward to working in this production. Hayes Centebear said, "I heard Frank Bradley was a terrific director."

Everett, a Monroe County native and employee of Peninsula Hospital, said of Our Town, "The play is moving -- just beautiful." Rudisill described it as "my personal favorite."

Ayers also enjoys this play; she said she "would love the challenge that this play offers."

Royer said of the production, "The fact that the play uses little or no props means that the audience will have to use their imagination. They'll have to think about it more than about television shows or movies, and that's good because we also want people to think about the play's message."

Perhaps Robinson best summed up the cast's attitude: "I'm excited to be working in it!"

Bikers to ride across state

by Jimmy Simerly and the Communications Office

What do Bruce Guillaume, Leslie Nier, Larry Stanley, Margot Eyring, and five Maryville College students have in common? They all intend to bicycle across Tennessee during spring break.

They will leave for Memphis in a college van on Saturday, March 19, and begin bicycling back across the state the next day.

The group will spend each night in churches and homes of alumni along the way and are expecting to arrive back on the Maryville College campus at approximately 5 p.m. on Monday, March 28, the day classes resume. There will be a welcoming reception of students, faculty, and city and county officials to greet them on their return.

The bicycle trip is being made in conjunction with the Maryville College Mountain Challenge program, and the students will receive one-hour portfolio credit toward graduation for their efforts.

When asked why those in the program are facing such a challenge, Guillaume said that the trip will provide visibility for the college and will "personally challenge" those participating in it.

"Dear Library Pad" allows students to voice opinion

by Julie Mullaney

Q. What is tall and thin, full of conflicting remarks, and stands in the library?

A. The "Dear Library" pad, of course!

Just what exactly is the "Dear Library" pad, and how did it get there? Who placed it where it is? To find the answers to these perplexing questions, I went straight to the top -- Library Director Joan Worley.

Her story of the "Dear Library" pad's birth went like this:

"I loved the easel. I saw it in the basement and thought, 'That's so pretty; it ought to be used for something.' A few days later I found a huge pad of paper and I thought: 'A-h-h-h-h! I know what I can do!'"

Worley said that the pad, which was first put up in the 1984-85 school year, was originally intended to be a "suggestion box" of sorts.

At first, Worley said that it "got a lot of suggestions and comments about the library" and after that about the library renovations. There were at first "a lot of questions like 'Where's the clock?'" Then, she said, "People stopped commenting on the library. We now put together other topics for people to comment on."

And comment they do. One page, which began "If I ran the college I would..." was sent to President Richard I. Ferrin after the quotation was finished by numerous students. This was, Worley said, "... Just a sudden idea." The plan to add the comments to Ferrin was announced in advance.

Worley believes that the pad "may provide an outlet for expression for people who might not normally speak up about a problem."

"Sometimes it ends up looking like a bathroom wall," she added, "but we don't police it." Worley also said that she noticed that sometimes the students do police it.

When students were asked about their feelings toward the "Dear Library" pad, most of them had similar responses.

"I think it's a good idea, but it's too bad that everybody doesn't take it seriously," commented freshman David Yocom.

Peggy Lane, a sophomore, seemed to agree: "It's neat, but sometimes the students don't use it right." Lane added, "It could be useful, if the students use it correctly."

Marilyn McCoy, a sophomore, felt that it was "a good idea" also, but said that she thinks "a lot of people put down stupid things that are irrelevant."

Lisa Berry, a transfer student, said that if the pad were used appropriately, she thinks it would be "a good source of feedback."

At the first part of the Spring Semester, the pad posed this question about itself for its users: "Should we take it down or leave it up?" The almost unanimous response was to "leave it up" -- and so it is.

Spring Fever: Give in to it a little

Spring Fever, that enemy of students, professors, and anyone with a job to do, is making its way across the MC campus, hard on the heels of the various stomach and cold viruses that recently made their widespread attack.

Spring Fever is a more insidious affliction, because it strikes slowly and quietly, keeping its presence unannounced until it has reached its final, firmly entrenched stages.

The causes are varied: crocuses, warm weather and/or sunny skies, the approach of spring break, the mountains hanging on the horizon, and even the simple turning of calendar pages.

The symptoms are also varied, ranging from a greater than usual inability to concentrate to all-around-lethargy. If you find your eyes drawn ever more inextricably away from the task at hand and towards the nearest window (or just into blank air), then Spring Fever could be the culprit.

The existence of Spring Fever is difficult to diagnose: not quite tangible, but nonetheless very real, affecting most people, at one time or another, to a greater or lesser degree. So, what can we do about it?

Most people would advise hard work and diligent willpower to counter Spring Fever's interruptive presence. But this malady can be like a spider's web -- the harder you struggle against it, the tighter it grips.

The answer, then, is to not fight so hard; after all, Spring Fever isn't all that bad. Indulge it a little. Allow a little "lollygagging"; 'tis the season for it. But, unfortunately, letting it get out of hand could be hazardous to your job and your GPA, and thus cause extra worries down the line.

Don't be afraid to lose yourself for a little while, because automatons are rarely happy or fulfilled. For everyone, spring is perhaps the best season for having fun. For students, the college years are the best time for it. Don't let the season (or these years) slip by.

Spring Fever may be annoying during term-paper time, study sessions, or I. S. labors, but at heart it's a nudge for the overworked towards loosening up. Just don't let that nudge become a downhill shove.

Greedy evangelists soil honest preachers' image

by Ryan Tipton

In recent years there has been a steady increase in the popularity and wealth of television evangelists. Many more people respond to this ever-increasing medium, and they hear and see the problems these ministers have and how they are constantly begging people to send money.

These types of preachers can be broken down into the following categories: "money grubbers," "money grubbers for the Lord," "fallen money grubbers," and "money grubbers who will do anything to get more."

"Money grubbers" are preachers who get up in front of the camera and spill their hearts and souls to the people in TV land about how they have taken a second mortgage out on their houses, how their stockholders are demanding payment on their shows, and how the ministry will collapse without "X" number of dollars by the end of the week. They do and say all of this while wearing silk suits and Rolex Imperials on their arms.

Jerry Falwell is a good example of preachers who fit in this category. Every Sunday morning he gets up in front of the camera and pleads with his viewers to send money for 30 minutes or more, and then he delivers a 10- to 15-minute sermon.

After that he makes another plea for money until the hour of his show is up on his show.

In addition to the "money grubbers," there are the "money grubbers for the Lord." A fitting character for this kind of preacher is television minister-turned-Republican presidential candidate Pat Robertson.

Robertson, who is the former executive of the Christian Broadcasting Network (CBN), announced his candidacy through airtime on CBN. He began asking for donations to support his candidacy, which he referred to as doing "the Lord's work." CBN now has whole segments of airtime allocated to raising funds by providing reasons why Robertson thinks the Lord has told him to run for President. It would seem that CBN, which has almost filed for bankruptcy twice, would stick to broadcasting the standard message of, "Send money for the Lord's work through us," instead of, "Send money for Pat's White House Bid."

Another category is "fallen money grubbers." The prime subject is former executive of the PTL Club and now-defrocked minister, Jim Baker.

Baker, also known as Jesse James, Jr., Diamond Jip, the King of the Gold-plated Bathroom Fixtures, and the Lord of Lip Service,

Dean's list omits Japanese student

Editor, Highland Echo:

I was surprised that the Dean's list, published in the February 5 issue of the Highland Echo, did not reflect the achievement of my friend. She worked hard here at Maryville and, despite being from Japan, received straight "A's" in her studies.

I realize that international students take some different studies, but this student participated in many regular classes, receiving an "A" in all she attempted.

I was particularly shocked when she was not on the Dean's list, because Dr. Kim had informed the international students that they could receive the distinction of being on the Dean's list for their achievements here at Maryville.

The above reasonings lead me to believe that the only possible reason my friend was not included on the Dean's list was because the studies of foreign students are held in low esteem -- is this racism?

Sincerely,
Hiroki Matsuya

She feels editing distorted her letter

by Julie Mullaney

Editor, Highland Echo:

I was glad when I found out that my article was printed in the last issue of the Highland Echo — that is, until I read it. After reading it, I realized that it had been changed a lot in the editorial process and had evolved into something that was not what I had written.

The person who edited my article had approached me about it before it was printed, saying that it was good, but that she "didn't understand" the last part of it. This, I found, was where most of the editing was done.

My article, which was supposed to be about apathy, had ended with a question which, I thought, pulled the whole article (which was, up to that point, purposely written in a disjointed fashion) together. Apparently, after all the other changes were made, that question, which was the only place where the word "apathy" was used, no longer fit, so it was dropped.

This left something which might have appeared to be about STUN meetings (this was reinforced by the headline "STUN succeeds") or the Student Senate meeting and it almost sounded as if I meant to attack the Office of Student Life.

Worst of all, my name, which was, incidentally, misspelled, was still at the end of the article. This, to me, is as bad as misquoting someone or using a quotation out of context. I see absolutely nothing wrong with editing for the sake of space, but I believe it is wrong to change the meaning of someone's words to suit one's own personal taste or understanding. I am highly disappointed.

Thank you,
Julie Mullaney

(The Echo apologizes for any misrepresentation; it was unintentional — the Ed.)

Students display apathy, even on alcohol issue

Editor, Highland Echo:

To be honest, when I was first asked to write something for the paper, I was going to flog a dead horse and write about the "dry campus" controversy.

But now, after talking to some of my fellow classmates, I have decided to change the theme to "Apathy in America's Youth." Let me state now that by no means am I calling everyone on this campus apathetic. I only talked to the students in one class, about 13 students. Still, I was shocked by the overall disinterest of my classmates.

When I asked them questions about how they felt about a dry campus, and how they felt about the administration passing the bill without getting the opinions of the students, they gave a little lip service, but the overall consensus was, "I don't care!"

I tried another approach, talking about the proposal to have a designated drinking place for those over 21 years of age. I got a very slightly different answer: "That's the seniors' problem!"

I mentioned to them that one of these days they would hopefully be seniors, too, and wouldn't it be nice to have a place on campus to go when they wanted to drink. The answers I got?

"That's in the future."

"I'll cross that bridge when I get there."

"I don't care."

Are these the people who are going to be in charge of my future? Who is going to make decisions about what goes on in our government? Our environment? Our society? More importantly, who is going to question these decisions, to make sure that they are the right one for the American people?

People today, young and old alike, need to become more involved in what is going on in the world around them. Yes, Virginia, there is more to life than MTV.

I realize that this letter will make some people angry with me. But that is okay. At least they will be getting off their duffs.

Sincerely,
Krista Ross-Mull

was ousted from his position at PTL in 1987 after it was discovered that he had been paying blackmail money to church secretary, Jessica Hahn, so she would keep her mouth shut about a sexual liaison she had with Diamond Jip in 1980. Subsequently, PTL, which stands for "Praise the Lord," became known as "Pass the Loot" so we can "Pay the Lady." Exposure of Baker's little bit of fooling around cost him his job as chief beggar for the PTL, and with it, the money he had wallowed in got taken away from his grubby hands.

In addition to Baker, there is a new member of the fallen category. Evangelist Jimmy Swaggart, who, when he heard about Baker's fall, spoke openly of "purging such vileness from the church," admitted to sexual misconduct in February. The exposure and admittance of his actions show just how hypocritical a person can be about another person, while doing the same thing the first person was caught doing.

Perhaps, the most extreme of these characters are the "money grubbers who will do or say anything to get more." The worst of these is a fellow named Oral Roberts.

In January 1987, Roberts announced that the Lord had told him in a vision that if he did not raise four million dollars by the end of March, the Lord would "take him home." To many people, saying that the Lord would kill him if he did not get the money proved what a con-artist Roberts is.

As the end of March drew near, Roberts was way below his four million dollar goal, and it appeared that the public was going to find out whether the Lord's "promise" was valid. However, exactly one week before the "deadline," a dogtrack owner in Miami donated 1,500,000 dollars, which put Roberts over his goal. When asked why he gave such a large donation to Roberts, the man replied, "I just want him to shut up. Besides, it's tax-deductible."

There are many other television evangelists who could fit into these categories. The real shame of it all is that these preachers damage the integrity of those everyday, God-fearing, charitable ministers who are truly doing the work of the Lord.

The media exposure of the money grubbers causes stereotyping of all ministers, and this makes the ones who truly care about the Lord and the people they are trying to reach seem less credible.

Campbellsville artwork in FAC

by Lissa McLeod

This month's art exhibit at the FAC is the result of an exchange program with Campbellsville College in Kentucky.

Last month Maryville College students' works were exhibited here, and this month the Campbellsville students display their talents while the Maryville exhibit is displayed at Campbellsville.

The exhibit includes a comprehensive mixture of media -- from oil and acrylic paintings, to silkscreen and linoleum block prints, to pottery and sculpture.

While the exhibit contains "a good variety of media," as senior Selena Dockery commented, the Campbellsville exhibit does not contain as many different artists as the Maryville one did. Thelma Bianco, art teacher at MC, commented, "There are not many students represented for the amount of work [displayed]."

While there may not be as many artists represented, the individual artists displayed show a greater command of more media than did the Maryville show. Senior Jennifer Chastain observed that "each student works in a lot of media."

In many cases, the wider exposure to media has not led to a sacrifice in quality of the work. However, the strongest artists in the exhibit tend to display one medium more heavily than others.

Perhaps the strongest works displayed are the acrylic paintings of Jean Pennebaker and the graphite drawings of James Davis. Pennebaker's paintings display a good command of color, especially "Black Goat at Sunset." Davis' drawings command respect with his use of depth and attention to detail.

While Pennebaker and Davis illustrate the greatest command over one medium, Delora Fox's works demonstrate the widest use of media by one artist. Fox has incorporated mattings into pictures, done some silkscreen and linoleum block prints, and made paper and molded it with various objects. All of her work shows a careful craftsmanship and imagination.

Atlanta campus off-limits to Lee filming of School Daze

(CPS) -- Director Spike Lee's first film -- a low-budget sex farce called She's Gotta Have It -- made him famous. But when the now-successful Lee returned to Morehouse College, the Atlanta school from which he graduated in 1979, to shoot his second movie, he wasn't very well-received. In fact, he was asked to leave.

Lee said it was because the film -- now being released across the country -- is about class and color divisions among students at a black college.

Morehouse administrators say it was because Lee wouldn't tell them what the movie, called School Daze, was about.

"We asked him what the film was about," recalled Dr. Hugh Gloster, then Morehouse's president, "but he wasn't inclined to tell us. After the film was being shot, we began to receive reports concerning what it was about from the students."

He didn't like what he heard:

School Daze, it turns out is set at a fictitious black southern college called Mission, where the students divide themselves into cliques of lighter-skinned "wannabees" -- as in "want to be whites" -- and darker-skinned, lower-income students called "jigs."

It all sounded "downgrading" to Gloster, who then told Lee to get off the school grounds, and the ban on filming the movie was extended by the five other presidents whose schools share the Atlanta University Center (AUC) campus.

"He wouldn't show it," AUC Chancellor Dr. Charles Merideth said of Lee and the script; "We couldn't see it, so we said it couldn't be shot."

Lee figured, "I had nothing to gain by letting them see the script," adding he thought its subject would be enough to provoke the presidents into exiling him.

Lee insists School Daze is accurate, that Morehouse was socially divided along skin tone and class lines when he attended; "We exaggerated lit in the film, but there were cliques."

Gloster disagreed: "It [happens] in black society, yes, but not among our students."

Merideth also conceded that "a long time ago there were fraternities and sororities for light-skinned people only, but nothing would suggest that's operative today."

"It's a lie," asserted Dr. Calvert Smith, president of Morris Brown, another AUC college, adding "You're not going to find that kind of differentiation on these college campuses."

Campus residents themselves are not sure.

see Spike p.5

Filming, campuses controversial mixture

(CPS) -- The five colleges that share the Atlanta University Center aren't the only ones grappling with the problems of letting movies be shot at their schools.

Harvard, for one, is "quite rigid about the making of movies here," reported Margery Heffron of the Harvard News Office.

"[It's] so disruptive we won't allow it without a compelling reason," she said.

Officially, Heffron added, Harvard won't permit filming of movies intended sheerly for entertainment rather than education.

The Europeans was the last movie made on campus, but only because novelist Henry James "wrote it to take place on Harvard," Heffron explained.

The University of Oregon, which anonymously was the backdrop for Animal House, is more liberal about moviemaking.

Muriel Jackson, OU's movie coordinator, recalls reading the Animal House script before filming began and then discussing it with People from both on and off campus attended the International Dinner on Saturday, March 12, in Pearsons; here, the diners watch the after-dinner entertainment.

International Club hosts dinner

by Noriko Iwanaga

Can you imagine how wonderful it is to eat different dishes from all over the world and to meet people from other countries while we stay in one place. On March 12, the International Club dinner was held in Pearson's dining hall; about 150 people attended the dinner.

International students in the costumes of their own countries served seven dishes, including Arabic salad (Taboleh), Japanese green beans with sesame, Chinese chicken dumplings, Arabic chicken and rice, Malaysian hot noodles, Chinese almond pudding, and the Arabic sweet, baklava, were served. The baklava was gone especially soon.

Khaled Irar from Jordan, in charge of Arabic dishes, said, "Baklava is a delicious and popular sweet," but he also said that it takes a long time to make because each thin pastry sheet is first buttered and then stacked.

After dinner the international students gave a performance. There were some numbers in which the students danced, sang, played the harmonica, and played the guitar. In addition, American students who take Japanese class sang a traditional Japanese song about cherry blossoms, called "Sakura, Sakura."

The International Club president, Kayoko Nagakura, said, "Because of members' hard work and many people's help, the dinner was well done." She said that profit from the dinner will be used for such activities as going on a picnic and for the International Dinner next year.

Spike from p. 4

"There are cliques," observed Janet Jones, a senior resident at Spelman, Morehouse's sister school, "but I don't think it's a matter of skin tone as much as socioeconomic background."

Spelman freshman Tracy Williams doesn't see divisions of any kind, noting her circle of friends are a diverse group.

Classmate Stephanie Brown said "There are [cliques], but it's not really obvious. Most of the light-skinned girls hang with light-skinned girls, and the dark-skinned girls hang with dark-skinned girls. But it's not as if they don't like each other. They just don't hang together."

"Spike's main aim is to make films and make money," Gloster said. "Our concern is to protect our schools while he's doing that."

"His portrayal was sensational in an effort to make money," Smith added. "I hope he gets rich, but not at the expense of black institutions."

Lee ultimately did move the filming off Morehouse grounds, though he finished shooting at other parts of the AUC campus because of a previous binding agreement he'd gotten.

Merideth called it "an amicable resolution" to the problem, but Lee, on tour to promote School Daze, remains angry.

"It wasn't as if I was somebody who didn't know the history of black schools, and was coming down to hurt them," he said.

Gloster, though, said it's a closed issue; "All we wanted was to get him off our campuses."

Movies from p. 4

the president.

"He asked one question," she remembered: "Is it funny?"

Personal Best, a film about women runners starring Mariel Hemingway, didn't get past administrators as easily because "I thought there would be some problems with the lead character having a lesbian relationship in the movie," Jackson said.

In the end, Personal Best was made at OU, though the school wouldn't allow its name used in the credits.

Harvard also won't let its name be used in movie credits to avoid the appearance of "endorsing the film or anything shown in it," Heffron reported.

There are other reasons to be touchy about campus filmmaking.

Salt Lake City police arrested two University of Utah students in late January after being notified of a robbery in progress at a bicycle shop.

But it turned out the students -- Matt Elggren and Jim Schmeppel -- were shooting a scene for a three-minute movie for their film studies class, and were released.

KSO season to center on 'music in the city' theme

from KSO communications

The Knoxville Symphony Orchestra (KSO) 1988-89 Masterworks series of concerts in the Tennessee Theatre will include return engagements of three guest artists "by popular demand," debut appearances in Knoxville by other world-renowned artists, plus a choral/dance showcase in the Civic Auditorium next February, Maestro Kirk Trevor has announced.

The Symphony has chosen "Music in the City" as the theme for its 54th season, which comprises eight pairs of Thursday/Friday concerts from September 1988 to May 1989. All of these Masterworks subscription concerts, except for the February choral/dance showcase in the Civic Auditorium, will be performed in the Tennessee Theatre.

The 1988-89 season opening concerts in the Tennessee Theatre, September 15 and 16, 1988, at 8:15 p.m., will feature the return engagement of famed Russian pianist Alexander Toradze performing Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1.

Toradze, whose playing has been deemed "diamond perfection" (Musical America), last performed with the KSO in April 1987 to sold-out houses, standing ovations both evenings, and rave reviews: "The audience jumped to its feet for a standing ovation almost before the final crashing chords of Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 2 finished rolling through the balcony," a local critic reported.

On February 16 and 17, 1989, the Appalachian Ballet Company, which is housed on campus in Fayerweather, will join the KSO and a full chorus at the Civic Auditorium, at 8:15 p.m., to perform Orff's Carmina Burana and Elgar's Enigma Variations. Trevor said that these special showcase concerts next February will give audiences the opportunity "to hear two totally different 20th-century masterpieces -- Orff's Carmina Burana, with its ribald, raucous personality, and Elgar's Enigma Variations, with its Victorian nobility and patriotic nostalgia."

Trevor's showcase performance concept, featuring other local arts groups with the Orchestra, has proved to be popular with local audiences. The Civic Auditorium provides a stage large enough to accommodate a chorus, dance company, and the Orchestra. The Civic Auditorium also offers 1,000 more seats than does the Tennessee Theatre, which is the regular performance hall for the KSO's subscription concerts.

Also returning to Knoxville next season "by popular demand" will be violinist Miriam Fried, who last performed with KSO in November 1985, and violist Paul Neubauer, who last performed with the KSO in January 1986.

Fried, acclaimed for "fiery intensity and emotional depth" of playing (the New York Times) will perform Sibelius' Violin Concerto in D minor on January 19 and 20, 1989. Joseph Gingold, with whom Miriam Fried continues to study at Indiana University, says that she is "one of the greatest violinists of this age." She also studies with Ivan Galamian at the Juilliard School. Her 1971 triumph as the first woman to win the Queen Elizabeth Competition that her in the international limelight, where she remains today. Her recording of the Sibelius Concerto with the Helsinki Philharmonic is being released this year.

Violist Neubauer, whom the New York Times called "a master musician," will return to Knoxville as guest soloist with the Orchestra at the March 16 and 17, 1989 concerts. He will perform the world premiere of David Ott's Viola Concerto, which is being commissioned by the

by Lissa McLeod

Images of Spring Break are as varied as there are students. Yet, one image that many college students share includes lying on a beach while the sun beats down on your body, the smell of suntan oil, the grit of sand, and the relaxing sound of waves continually crashing on the beach.

For one group of students, however, images of Spring Break include ice, blustery wind, the inside of a bus, the unfamiliarity of seven different beds, singing, singing, and more singing. Of course, this group is the concert choir, and each spring break brings with it the choir tour -- this year to Ohio.

Choir tour is an "interesting" concept. By spring break, all students are exhausted and ready to rest. But for the choir, the work is only beginning. As the choir tour serves as a major recruiting tool for the school, and especially the Music Department, the schedule is crammed full to meet the most people possible in one week.

This year, the choir will be singing in five schools and eight churches.

Add to the concert schedule travel time in the bus between stops, visiting with alumni at dinners and receptions, and having to stay with different host families every night (meaning that you recount your life goals and ambitions as well as your family history every night), and you get David Yocum's sentiments: "I expect [tour] to be very tiring; I hope I don't fall asleep."

Don't worry, David, you won't fall asleep in your coat and tie -- you won't get comfortable enough! While everyone in Florida will be wearing their favorite shorts and cut-off T-shirts, the choir will be wearing coats and ties (for guys) and dresses (for girls). This year is the first year that there has been a dress code for tour. Director Jeff Baxter explains it is part of an effort to upgrade our image in the various churches and schools we visit and to appear professional.

Despite the exhaustion and the dress code, tour is also fun. As senior Bobby Montgomery anticipates, "I'm looking forward to getting to know people better." Freshman Michelle Karr said, "I'm just waiting to find out" what tour is all about.

Yet, every tour is different, just as the choir is different each year. As senior Carol Warren said, "I never make any opinion about tour before I get there."

MC students who would like to see the result of a week of hard work are invited to the Choir Tour concert on Monday, March 28, at 8:15 p.m. It is free and is the same program performed on tour, featuring the Maryville College Concert Choir of 1987-88.

Nursing program augments MC's 'liberal arts education'

by Marianne Rucker

The nursing program at MC began in the fall of 1985 under the direction of Dr. Mary Lenny and serves two types of students pursuing the BSN.

Those with no education or experience in nursing follow the generic nursing curriculum which requires four years of full-time college work.

Already licensed R.N.s receive credit for their college-level study and can challenge some nursing courses by passing proficiency exams. These students are in the CE program.

The curriculum consists of general education courses and courses on nursing theory and clinical practice.

Lenny retired in December of 1987. Mardi Craig, instructor of Medical-Surgical Nursing, is acting head of the department.

"The goal of the MC nursing program is to graduate intellectual, caring persons who use knowledge from humanities, principal and social science, and nursing to promote optimum health," stated Craig. "We emphasize the caring and compassionate aspect of nursing."

"We have a strong clinical component and we intend to keep that," Craig said. MC's clinical affiliations are with Fort Sanders Regional Medical Center (FSRMC), Blount Memorial Hospital (BMH), East Tennessee Children's Hospital (ETCH), and other community agencies.

"The nursing curriculum consists of the well care component, the sick-care component, and the community care component," Craig stated.

There are two full-time instructors -- Craig and Gail Cliff. Marty Rucker, Mary Barnett, and Barbara Lowe are adjunct faculty. A search is underway for a new director.

Over forty R.N. students are in the CE program, and eleven students are in the generic program.

Jeanne Borden graduated from St. Mary's in 1980. She is an R.N. at Blount Memorial and works in ICU (Intensive Care Unit).

Borden has been a CE student in the BSN program for three years. She chose MC because it has "a smaller ratio of students and there's more individualized instruction."

"I've taken care courses which have made me a more well-rounded person. English 130 helped me with writing, and math 120 has helped me in management with staffing patterns," stated Borden.

"The nursing instructors at MC have been the best I've had. They're flexible and understanding," Borden added.

Borden is currently taking Nursing 301 (Developmental Needs) which includes clinical experience at the Blount County Health Department and ETCH.

"We look at the well child and the family," said Borden. "I had a well child as a client and interacted with that child and his family. I worked on assessing developmental skills and social skills and how to meet needs in those areas."

In Fall, 1987, Borden's clinical work for Nursing 311 (Health Deviation D) was at Ft. Sanders and ETCH where she interacted with sick children and adults.

"I see myself building more in theory. I'm seeing a lot that I missed as far as the total picture," Borden said. She plans to graduate in the spring of 1989.

Gail Fetter is a member of the first class of generic students. She started at MC in September 1986

ETSU to host conference

by from ETSU Communications

Johnson City -- In celebration of National Adult and Continuing Education Week, East Tennessee State University (ETSU) will host a videoconference, "Teaching Today's Adults: Focus on Careers," on Wednesday, March 23, from 5 through 7 p.m.

The live satellite presentation is a joint effort of USA Today, and the PBS Adult Learning Service and the American Association for Adult and Continuing Education.

Originating from Washington, D.C., this videoconference will allow local adult educators across the country to participate with and learn from experts in the field. It is especially recommended for educators involved with adults, GED testing and corrections facilities.

Dr. Ken McCullough, director of adult education for the Tennessee Department of Education, will be on campus to introduce the program, discuss adult education statewide, and provide closing comments. A representative of the Johnson City Press will also make a special presentation on that newspaper's work in adult education and literacy.

Scheduled in the D.P. Culp University Center's meeting room 6, the conference is open to the public at a cost of fifteen dollars. For information, contact Dr. Paul Fendt, ETSU director of continuing education, at (615) 929-4223.

above named works, the upcoming 1988-89 "Music in the City" Masterworks subscription series will feature a wide range of repertoire from the 18th to the 20th centuries. Among the symphonies to be heard next season are Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 in E flat ("Eroica"), Bruckner's Symphony No. 4 in E flat ("Romantic"), Prokofiev's Symphony No. 5 in B flat, and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor.

Other orchestral selections to be performed by the KSO on its Masterworks series include Verdi's Overture to I Vespri Siciliani, Copland's El Salon Mexico, Wagner's Orchestral Highlights from Der Ring des Nibelungen, Adams' "Tromba Lontana," Rossini's "William Tell Overture," Ravel's "Mother Goose Suite," Debussy's Iberia, and the world premiere of an overture by Rodriguez, commissioned by the Knoxville Symphony Society.

Report profiles defaulters

(CPS) -- Students who tend to default on their Guaranteed Student Loans aren't dishonorable, they're just poor, a General Accounting Office (GAO) report issued last week claimed.

The GAO -- which audits federal spending programs -- is trying to draw a "profile" of a typical GSL defaulter, agency official William Gainer told the House Postsecondary Education Subcommittee, and is finding so far that dropouts, students who support themselves, and students who are stuck in lower-paying jobs make up the bulk of the nation's defaulters.

More than half -- 56 percent -- of the former students in default did not graduate, Gainer said.

He added the GAO's "preliminary results" agreed with the testimony at a January loan default "summit" of students and officials from around the country, organized by Representative Pat Williams (D-Montana).

Many campus aid directors asserted defaulters were not deadbeats, but people who were simply unable to afford to repay their loans.

The GAO's emerging profile of the typical defaulter "raises serious concerns about forcing needy students to take out loans, rather than [get] grants" that don't have to be repaid, American Council on Education official Charles Sanders said.

In its new budget proposal, released last week, the Reagan administration suggested raising the amount of money the government gives to grants.

In its prior seven proposals, the administration had sought to reduce students' reliance on grants -- which are much more expensive for the government -- in favor of loans.

Season tickets to the KSO's 1988-89 "Music in the City" Masterworks series and further information about the upcoming season may be obtained by contacting the Knoxville Symphony Society office, Monday-Friday, 9 a.m.-5p.m., 523-1178, 708 Gay St., Knoxville, TN 37902.

KSO from p. 5

Knoxville Symphony Society. Neubauer last performed with the KSO at the January 1986 concert when the KSO also performed the world premiere of Ott's "Water Garden." After their meeting at that concert, Neubauer and Ott have been collaborating to produce the Viola Concerto.

Following a recent world premiere performance of a work by David Ott with the National Symphony, the Washington Post review proclaimed, the "Debut of a Masterpiece" and noted that the audience gave a five-minute ovation.

The guest artists for the October 13 and 14, 1988, concerts will be a special treat for longtime KSO subscribers. Violinist Mary Kay Robinson, formerly Mary Kay McQuilkin of Knoxville, will return with her husband, New York Philharmonic principal oboist Joseph Robinson, for a "homecoming" performance with the KSO. A principal violinist of the Knoxville Symphony in the late 1960's, she was frequently a featured soloist with the Orchestra.

The internationally celebrated young cellist Ofra Harnoy will perform Saint-Saens' Cello Concerto No. 1 in A minor with the Orchestra November 10 and 11, 1988. Of Harnoy's performing, the New York Times commented: "She seemed born to the instrument...the music seemed to sing within her as it was played. This is a rare gift indeed." Ovation magazine praised her: "Fresh vision, superb technique, flawless instinctive musicianship, excellent intonation; in a word, she plays magnificently."

The April 13 and 14, 1989 subscription concerts will be an all orchestral program featuring Trevor conducting two all-time favorites, Mozart's Symphony No. 41 in C Major ("Jupiter") and Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra.

The final Masterworks subscription concert of the KSO's 1988-89 season, on May 11 and 12, 1989, will feature 26-year-old pianist Jeffrey Biegel, who performed in Knoxville on the Young Pianists Series at the Bijou Theatre during the 1986-87 season. He will perform Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5 in E flat ("Emperor").

Trevor described his first meeting with Jeffrey Biegel in Knoxville: "Jeffrey Biegel played for me in an empty hall after his recital... and within 10 minutes, I knew we had a soloist for this [1988-89] season. The Beethoven concerto will surely present him as an emperor of the keyboard!"

The New York Times described Biegel's recital at Alice Tully Hall (Lincoln Center): "...the sort of event that can propel a young career into orbit. Mr. Biegel plays with remarkable assurance and maturity...a deep musicality was always at the heart of his pyrotechnics...with the best of the current crop of pianists." In addition to the (OCR) -- Magic bus: Some 70 students from the University of Pennsylvania and Drexel University have joined forces to help distribute food to Philadelphia's homeless and hungry. Their "workplace" is an old bus, painted in psychedelic colors, parked in a section of town known for its many homeless. The student volunteers help serve food, which is donated from area restaurants.

(OCR) -- Shelters of cardboard and plastic bags are the latest weapons in the fight to help the homeless. First-year design students at the University of Texas-Austin created 13 portable shelters as a class assignment. The students constructed their designs out of string, garbage bags, and cardboard boxes they found in trash bins. The more ambitious shelters include plastic-covered floors, front and back doors, and two room designs. The students plan to donate their creations to the homeless.

(OCR) -- Cornell University's School of Hotel Administration is offering a new course this semester, "Housing and Feeding the Homeless." Students will work in area shelters and food banks, helping with bulk-food purchases and designing recipes, as well as fund-raising. The class is funded by Cornell's Fund for Educational Initiatives, which aims to enhance undergraduate education through new approaches to social problems.

(OCR) -- Design students at the University of Nebraska-Lincoln are working on more permanent housing for the homeless. The University of Nebraska is one of the several schools participating in the "Search for Shelter" program, sponsored by three groups -- the American Institute of Architects, the Neighborhood Reinvestment Corporation, and the American Institute of Architecture Students. Designs will include emergency transitional housing for families trying to get back on their feet and long-range single-room housing.

(OCR) -- Florida Leader magazine has complained that David Letterman won't do interviews with college publications. The leader says Letterman is being arrogant and rude. After all, students have been his best audience: "Letterman seems to have forgotten who helped make him the popular comedian he is today."

Featured as part of OU's alcohol awareness week, the contest had two categories of prizes: cocktails and punch. University officials and student leaders judged the entries on taste, appearance, nutritional value, originality, and bartender attire. A special award was given for the worst drink.

Hundreds of illegally owned milk crates were literally thrown out of Edinboro University of Pennsylvania residence-hall windows after an article in the student newspaper said the "milk crate police" were coming with search warrants. after being discharged from the Air Force.

"I checked out Roane State and UT and wasn't impressed with either. The local hospitals were involved in their last classes," Fetter stated.

Fetter likes the size of MC and the area: "I'm at home and glad to be here."

"I wish more people knew about us because we need more nurses. I don't think the college is promoting the nursing program" said Fetter.

Becky Brooks graduated from Heritage High School in 1986 and started at MC that fall. She had investigated UT but said that it was "impersonal and seemed disorganized."

She chose MC because it was local and because of its good reputation. "People who graduate from MC have a better chance of getting a good job than people who go to a major university," Brook said.

Brooks has completed her care and major-related courses and has started her nursing courses. In her first clinical at Fort Sanders, Brooks stated, "We're learning therapeutic communication and the basics of nursing. Soon we'll be starting medications."

"I highly recommend MC to anyone who wants to go into nursing. All of the doctors and nurses that I've met are very impressed with MC," said Brooks.

How does nursing fit into MC, a small liberal arts college? "People in professional life need a liberal arts background. It fits because of the set issues that emerge. Critical thinking is becoming more important in nursing," said President Richard Ferrin.

Dismas House provides 'home' atmosphere

by Andi Bristol

Dismas

House: "A unique residence for ex-offenders in which students, volunteers, and professional staff provide support in a spirit of reconciliation," reads the statement of purpose found under the logo on the Dismas newsletter.

The local Blount County Dismas house does just that. As soon as you enter the house you can feel the genuine caring that goes on there.

Presently, there are four ex-offenders and three MC students, Heather Farrar, Greg Metcalf, and Matt Wayland in residence at Dismas House.

The first Dismas House was established in Nashville in 1974 by Father Jack Hickey and a group of Vanderbilt students to meet the needs of former prisoners upon their release. This still remains the basic purpose of Dismas Houses -- to provide a healthy atmosphere for prisoners upon their release from prison and to help them to assimilate into society.

As assistant director Pete Scala said, "Our main focus is on reconciliation of the ex-offender to society -- to show them that they are accepted." He added that the house also provides a place for them to live when without it they might not have any other place to go except back to the same environment that contributed to their crime.

"It's like a home.

They make you feel at home."

Everyone in the house is expected to participate in the daily chores and weekly house meetings. This, in addition to the nightly meals (except Saturdays), helps create a family-type atmosphere.

"The people here are like one big family. And if there's a problem, they'll all make time to listen," said David York, an ex-offender who has lived at the house for two weeks.

Marty Servo, another ex-offender, who has been there for one week, concurred, "It's like a home. They make you feel at home."

When asked what created that homey atmosphere, Steve Souder, director, said, "Meals are very important."

The weekly house meetings are also a big factor. "In the house meetings once a week we discuss the nuts and bolts that help the house run smoothly -- chores and things -- and we also have personal go arounds which give us time to share with each other and discuss problems," Scala said.

"The house meetings help us keep things together -- without them things would blow up," observed Wayland.

"We have the interaction and conflicts here that go along with any family," said Charles Bedoian, the night manager.

How do the ex-offenders feel about the assimilation process and interacting with college students?

"They [ex-offenders] improve themselves when they come here. It gives them time to slow down and think about things and people to talk to," said Greg White, one such resident.

"This is the first time I've been around college students, but they're no different," said Servo.

"They're fascinating. I can learn a lot from them -- we can learn a lot from each other," said York.

And the students? How have they adjusted to living in this communal/familial arrangement?

"I've had to communicate more -- both positively and negatively," admitted Metcalf, a senior. He also said, "It [Dismas House] is a transitional community for ex-offenders, but I also see it as a transitional community for myself -- from college to being on my own."

"It's real family-oriented. I like that!" Farrar, also a senior, said. She is presently the only female resident, which she says hasn't been a problem at all. She did add jokingly, "A friend of mine said that I was the only girl she knew who was living with 10 men."

Wayland said, "I feel real comfortable there. I feel like I'm a part of everything -- a contributing member of the household." He then added, "These ex-offenders aren't any different than any other people."

The Blount County Dismas House was formed in 1983. There are presently four other houses in operation: one each in Nashville; Memphis; Burlington; Vermont; and South Bend Indiana; with two more houses expected to be in operation within the next year -- one in Knoxville and one in Chattanooga.

There is a thorough interviewing process for both students and ex-offenders (to be a resident of Dismas House). The students are screened in order to make certain that they really want to live there and will participate in the house activities.

As far as the former prisoners go, the local Dismas House will not accept any sex offenders, people with untreated chemical dependencies, former drug dealers, or those who have committed violent crimes, said Scala. He then added, "We look for those people who have probably hit rock bottom and who have the seed of change."

The house assists about 20 to 25 former prisoners a year. They stay at least three months, but on average remain about five months.

The rent is $210 a month and this includes all meals (residents must fix their own breakfast and lunch) and laundry.

"I think sometimes that people just come here for the free laundry," Scala said jokingly.

There are three hard-and-fast rules that, if broken, will result in immediate expulsion from the house: no violence, no drugs (including alcohol), and no sex on the premises.

"We have no problem with people of legal age going out to have a drink (as long as they have never had a problem with alcohol). Or if anyone wants to go away for the weekend, that's their business," Souder said.

Volunteers from the community are also an integral part in the running of the house. All of the meals are prepared by these volunteers. This is also an important opportunity for interaction. As Scala stated, "Sometimes there isn't anyone in the house that they [the ex-offenders] can really connect with, but maybe a person

COMMENTARY

Let handicapped have parking

Dear Driver Parked in a parking space labeled "Handicapped":

You probably had a good reason for parking there, although there is no "Handicapped" license plate or placard on your car. Maybe you're in a hurry and just had to run in for a moment. Maybe it's raining and you forgot your umbrella. Maybe after a discouraging day at school or work, you were in no mood to tediously search the lot for open spaces. It's even a possibility that you just didn't see the "Handicapped" sign or emblem.

None of these excuses hold any water, because they're just that -- excuses.

People who have had strokes or people with MS (multiple sclerosis) don't have an excuse to park there; they have a reason. People who must use a wheelchair, braces, or a walker for mobility don't have excuses, either; they, too, have reasons. And so do all the people who are temporarily or permanently handicapped.

They need extra-wide parking spaces. They need spaces near the doors.

If you aren't handicapped, please save the special parking spaces for those who need them. Sooner or later, you might need them, too. Besides, a brisk walk might do you some good. You can carry a canteen and some trail mix for the trek to the doors, if need be.

If you are handicapped, please contact a physician about getting an identifying plate or placard. It is a shame that the state demands money for this "privilege," but it is cheaper than a string of tickets, which police will hopefully be handing out more generously.

If you continue to needlessly occupy parking spaces that are already too few, I'd like to suggest a punishment that fits the crime: that you experience, as closely as can be simulated, being handicapped. Try leg braces for a day. Or be wheelchair-bound. Maybe after treading the asphalt in another's awkward position, you'll be less impatient and more sensitive.

Editor's notes:

The perfect society. It has existed in Western thought nearly as long as there has been Western thought.

It cannot be visited, because it exists only in individual minds, each mind having a different view of it. This is one reason why the term "utopia," from the Greek for "no place," is particularly accurate.

Relatively few people consciously develop these views of utopia, still fewer articulate them, and still few successfully communicate them to others. Yet utopia, nebulous though its conception might be, continues to haunt human dreams.

There's nothing wrong with that. Playwright Tennessee Williams once pointed out that a glimpse of heaven makes life in this "jungle" more bearable.

Don't just dream of perfection; work towards it. Until those dreams become realizable, there's a real world to be reckoned with.

Hear the other side of the Central America story

by Steve Ledman

Maryville

College students and local friends will have the opportunity to visit with an authentic American hero on Wednesday evening, April 20, at 7:00 p.m., in the Music Hall. That night, the Peace Education Task Force will present Father Jose Alas, a legend in El Salvador for his work with the poor.

Father Alas (Chencho) will pay a return visit to the campus that night as part of his nationwide speaking tour "The Prospects for Peace in Central America: An Update on the Current Situation." Father Alas' talk will be one part of a multimedia program, "The Power of the Poor in Central America," which will include award-winning short documentary, Guazapa, and an internationally presented photographic exhibit of "Life in Central America."

Father Alas' presentation is particularly relevant given the Reagan administration's continued orchestrations of military histrionics in C.A. Histrionics used in an effort to divert attention from the real problem there: the poverty of the Central American people and the U.S.' proxy governments' refusal to do anything for them. Chencho's testimony should shed light on the Reagan administration's struggle to establish "democratic institutions" in the terrorist state of El Salvador. To this end, billions of dollars have been spent on weapons and aid in support of the Duarte regime in El Salvador (El Salvador now ranks second behind Israel in the amounts of U.S. aid, three-quarters of which is used in support of a war against the people of El Salvador).

Carefully staged media events -- Soviet Migs in Nicaragua, guerilla activity in El Salvador, rigged elections, and the ultimate theatric, a commie invasion of a "freedom-loving democracy" -- have been used to successfully mesmerize an American public who otherwise would abhor the activities of the security state's minions.

Fortunately, a total Orwellian state hasn't been instituted yet. Progressive organizations in the U.S. struggle to tell the story of the hundreds of thousands of disappeared and murdered; churches, supported by the testimony of returning missionaries, have become active opponents of a U.S. foreign policy that supports state terror. And the media, in response to the growing grassroots opposition, has begun to respond to the market with documentaries about the sporadic reporting of the continuing terror.

Yet these developments aren't the driving catalyst for change in Central America. The people's refusal to live in poverty is.

THE MIDEAST PEACE PROCESS

A NEW VERSION OF AN OLD CHILDHOOD GAME

Yuppies volunteer for wrong reasons

by Eric Doyle, senior, University of Illinois

(CPS) -- Causes are hip again. But not if you have to wear love beads.

The new volunteers are swarming to help the less fortunate at a startling rate. Perhaps more startling is their origin. These are not particularly socially conscious individuals raised on a kibbutz or a commune. These are people living in high-rises and driving cars that cost twice what most of us will be paid our first year out of college. These people are busy. They have money to earn, coffee beans to grind, brunches to eat.

Yuppies are volunteering. It's the latest thing.

Good for them. Right? What could be better than people with time, money, and compassion to give? People who actually give it.

As one volunteer put it, volunteering "makes me feel lucky. When I go home and see what I have, it all means so much more."

"There are so many social problems and so many ways to address them," noted another, adding that volunteering "makes you feel less guilty."

Shirley Keller, vice-president of Workplace Programs for Volunteers, speculates this sudden increase in volunteerism is, in part, due to the need for security. Individuals feel that if they look after someone now, someone will look after them later. Probably while their friends and children are boating.

Mike King, executive VP of the organization, has a different theory: "Why are they there? To meet other yuppies. It's better than a singles bar."

The newest trend, the compassion kick, is receiving more publicity every day. Tutors. Hospital volunteers. Soup-kitchen workers. Volunteering is a lot less fun than squash, but it beats aerobics any day.

The upwardly mobile are anxious to help. It sounds so good. It only takes a few hours a week.

However, as a friend of mine noted, "Um, I don't mean to cut it down, but I think volunteering has been around for quite a while. It's nothing new."

She's right. I have an aunt in Washington, D.C., who, every holiday season, stays there. Her mother lives in Chicago, as does the rest of her family, but my aunt stays to deliver Christmas dinner to shut-ins. She genuinely wants to help someone. She does not do it to make herself feel less guilty for owning a Cuisinart.

In many cases, a lot of the motivation is positive publicity. Companies that sponsor volunteer programs look good in the eyes of everyone but the stockholders. It bothers investors to think that their money may be poured into a company that is not putting all its effort into making more cash.

Some companies, most notably Atlantic Richfield Co., were forced to downplay volunteer expenditures when the company was not as profitable as it had been the previous year. Helping the less fortunate has its merits, but shareholders have their good points too.

There's something wrong with this whole rationale.

Volunteering, I always thought, was something one might do with one's extra time because there was a need to be filled. The needy take the form of homeless individuals, children with reading problems or senior citizens unable to pick up their own groceries. It could take the form of terminally ill kids.

This need, until now, had not manifested itself as a need to purge oneself of guilt or meet others who share that guilt in hopes of diffusing it.

One exec mentioned a day he was exhausted from work and contemplated skipping his customary visit to a terminally ill boy. He arrived at the hospital and told the kid what a bad day he had.

The boy replied, "Yeah, I had a pretty rough day, too."

Imagine that.

In a very warped way, however, things are happening. People are being helped. The motivation for all this positive action is laughable. And that's unfortunate. We're dealing with a very serious problem: people who are in desperate

LIFE IN THE GLASNOST LANE

'88 frontrunners standing firmly in the middle

by Andi Bristol

My mother always told me never to play in the middle of the road. Obviously, the front-runners in the '88 election never listened to their mothers.

The key phrase thus far in the election has to be "moderate." All of the key candidates either are moderates or are trying to downplay any controversial stances they may have.

Take George Bush, for instance. He is now (following Super Tuesday) the GOP front-runner. His stance on most issues, such as support for education and ending government corruption, is obviously noncontroversial. The issues, however, that he has been trying to downplay are his opposition of legalized abortion and his association with President Reagan concerning the Iran-Contra affair. He is riding on Reagan's coattails, yet because of the Contra scandal, he does not want to be too closely associated with him. It's like trying to walk a tightrope.

Another example of a candidate who is playing on the yellow lines in the road is Albert Gore, Jr.; he is trying to appeal to as many voters as possible. In the process, he is proclaiming himself a centrist, thus contradicting his liberal voting record. Another issue that Gore is skirting is his wife Tipper's involvement in the Parent's Music Resource Center, which is the group responsible for record labeling.

Michael Dukakis is understating his liberalism so that he can stand out in the middle of the road with the rest of the leading candidates. Instead of controversial issues, he is campaigning on the basis of experience as governor of Massachusetts and the "miracle" he performed on the state's budget. Despite his dependence on this budgetary "miracle," he has failed to be specific about his intentions concerning the federal deficit.

Jesse Jackson is probably the least wishy-washy candidate. However, he has come a long way from the liberal we saw in '84. He is for education and welfare and against defense spending; this much is certain. On the other hand, he has downplayed his religious background. Considering he is a reverend, this alone earns him a spot on the yellow line.

In order to appeal to the greatest number of voters, it has been necessary for the candidates in the '88 election to compromise their beliefs, at least in public, and take a middle-of-the-road stance on the issues (if they take any stance at all).

It is sad that the political culture in this country has driven the candidates in a presidential election to be vague, wishy-washy, and moderate instead of taking a stand.

TV commercials: marketing or overkill?

by Dan Fox

On March 27-28, 1988, channel 26 (NBC) presented the TV version of Gore Vidal's Lincoln.

The story coincided with the book fairly well, and the book isn't bad, either. It covers Lincoln's term as President of the U.S. (1861-1865), his reelection to a second term, and his assassination just after the Civil War.

All in all, it was an OK story, but I wish to focus on another aspect of the TV spotlight: commercials. At various times during the show, TV commercials not only interrupted the episodes, they forced themselves upon the viewer. At four particular points, the commercials ran over five minutes total.

I wonder if this is advertising, or is it overkill? How many times can one watch a Pepsi commercial? Or how long does it take to promote Master Card from Firestone?

In addition to extended time frames for commercials, Master Card and Pepsi were played almost back to back; not only were they played too much, in most instances they were played over and over during the same sequences.

I consider Americans

Owen comes 'home' to MC

by Lissa McLeod

Stephen Owen is back! For those who have had the chance to meet him and hear him sing, this is welcome news.

Owen is this year's affiliate artist and returns for his final visit to Maryville on April 3. He will remain in the area giving "informances" to various audiences, concluding his visit on April 14 with a full recital at the FAC music hall.

In a recent interview, Owen said he is looking forward to his return to Maryville, explaining, "It feels like a home away from home."

He also expressed gratitude to the people in the community (both college and town) who have made his stays so pleasant, especially to Dr. Robert Bonham, his accompanist. This April visit will be his fourth to Maryville as a part of the Affiliate Artist Residency program.

Affiliate Artists, Inc., is a 22-year-old organization based in New York that is committed to increasing awareness of the arts, especially in areas that might otherwise not have as much access to the arts, and supporting the careers of young performing artists.

An Affiliate Artist residency involves much more than an artist performing in various communities; there is a special, three-way contract in a residency between the artist, a sponsor, and a presenter.

The sponsor is a corporation, in Owen's case the Alcoa Foundation, that provides the money for the whole program. This includes the artist's living and transportation expenses during the residency.

The presenter is the party responsible for much of the logistics of the trip -- where the artist will live, publicity and the scheduling of concerts and "informances." In Owen's case the presenter is Maryville College. However, a presenter doesn't have to be a college; often local arts councils serve as presenters.

Maryville College has a unique relationship with Affiliate Artists, Inc., because its founder attended MC at one time. The relationship continues to be unique in that it is the last of the full six-week residency programs; most artists now spend each of their three two-week residencies in different locations.

Owen says that for this reason, the Maryville residency is a prestigious appointment and means a certain amount of job security

There isn't usually much time for chat at Our Town rehearsals, but President Ferrin, who plays Professor Willard, and Francie K. Ayers, who plays Emily, found time for a brief conversation, March 30.

Theatre gives Ferrin chance for involvement

by Jennifer C. Worth

What is the job of a college president? For Maryville College's president Richard I. Ferrin, duties include interviewing for administrative positions, negotiating with prospective patrons, communicating legislative decisions between the Board of Directors and student government, and learning his lines.

Learning his lines?

In addition to his ongoing administrative tasks, Ferrin has a job that is not usually part of a college president's job: he's in the cast of Our Town, the Maryville College Theatre spring production.

Why did Ferrin want to be in Our Town? "One of the things I believe is important for this institution is a sense of involvement, and I wanted to model that," he said.

His role, Professor Willard, is not large, which fits in better with his demanding schedule than a leading part would. In fact, he already has his part memorized!

"The way we've worked the schedule, he hasn't been called in to many rehearsals so far," said Theatre Director Frank Bradley. But even though Ferrin is not called on to log a lot of rehearsal time so far, the time demands for being in a production can be daunting.

"This is a hectic time of year," he said, adding that MC students could definitely agree.

As opening night, April 22, nears, things will only get more hectic for the entire cast, including Ferrin. That weekend is also the spring meeting of the Board of Directors. Ferrin is ready for the frantic pace of production week: "I knew it would be like that."

His limited rehearsal time so far has its drawbacks, chiefly the limited opportunities for interaction with the rest of the cast. "I don't come and stay and sit around and get into conversations with people, because there are so many other things to do," he said.

Stage manager Andi Bristol agreed. "He just hasn't had much interaction with us yet," she said of Ferrin.

Ferrin has had some opportunities to interact with the students, such as an interchange he had at a choral rehearsal with cast member Dan Fox, who teased the president for wearing blue jeans instead of his everyday office attire. Ferrin said, "I enjoy that kind of interaction."

As rehearsals begin to focus on longer sections of the play and more people have to rehearse together for longer periods of time, there will be more chances for that. Ferrin said of his relationship with the cast and crew, "I don't want to be more than an actor filling a role." He added, "I enjoy warm and open relationships with students."

Bradley said of Ferrin, "He's really enthusiastic. He's one of those people who are natural performers. If you've seen him speak, you can tell that he genuinely loves to get up in front of people."

Of Ferrin's performance as Professor Willard, Bradley noted, "He really seems, in the rehearsals we've had, to throw himself into it."

Ferrin's past acting experience includes high school and college work. He played the father in The Man Who Came to Dinner, and he played the scheming president of a small nation in Romanoff and Juliet, a cold-war version of Romeo and Juliet. In the movie version of the play, Peter Ustinov played the role. Ferrin said of that show, "It was a lot of fun."

Ferrin's time on the stage in Our Town may well aid audience turnout. Bristol commented, "I think it's going to do a lot of good for the department as far as publicity. Even though it's only a small part, I think people will come to see the president, and then they'll see the rest of the production as

Simon's cute Biloxi Blues goes nowhere

by Jennifer C. Worth

If the phrase "Jack of all trades, master of none" could be applied to a movie, the movie would be Biloxi Blues.

Biloxi Blues, Neil Simon's latest autobiographical play-turned-film, isn't bad, but it is self-indulgent. It's basically a trip down memory lane that is probably significant for Simon and the people in his life but lacks punch for anyone else.

The movie does have its funny moments. Unfortunately, a lot of these have already been given away in the television promos. Some of the formula basic training humor is here, as well as the obligatory first-trip-to-the-hooker scene (her name, by the way, is grandiose -- Rowena, harkening ironically back to chivalric days of yore). All this is neither startlingly original nor uproariously funny, but it is amusing.

In fact, there aren't any knee-slapping funny scenes in Biloxi Blues (although the promos will mistakenly lead you to believe that it's a screwball comedy). You'll be more likely to smile, half to yourself, than to laugh out loud.

The drama in Biloxi Blues could have taken up the slack left by the comedy, but it doesn't. It's just not gripping. Oh, there's a tense moment when MPs come to take away one of the platoon implicated for homosexuality. Some real emotion almost comes through when Eugene, the central figure and, presumably, Simon's self-portrait, falls in love with Daisy, a local girl. There's a hint of suspense when the drunken drill sergeant, played by Christopher Walken, threatens Eugene with a loaded pistol. But none of this potential fulfills itself.

Instead of powering up one or two effective themes or emotions, the film instead lays a superficial patchwork of emotion and theme so that there is little continuity or direction and no real climax.

Biloxi Blues isn't a total loss. (It's better than Police Academy 5.) Matthew Broderick is always personable, and he portrays a believable Eugene, a part he's played on Broadway. Because it is Eugene's memories we are seeing, he stands out less as a memorable character, like some of his boot-camp comrades, than as a chorus figure. The script never really lets us care about him, one way or another.

Walken, another big name, also succeeds in his role. After the establishment of the drill sergeant stereotype, seen in An Officer and a Gentleman and Full Metal Jacket, it's refreshing to see a different version. This sergeant is tough, as he must be, but he's also eccentric. We are even allowed a psycho-emotional insight into his mind, or at least we are allowed what passes for an insight in Biloxi Blues.

Biloxi Blues is a film that can't decide between being a bitter sweet drama with funny moments or a laugh-a-minute comedy with dramatic moments. It winds up being neither.

Neil Simon has long been a prolific, albeit not a great, playwright. I suppose he's starting to run out of things to write.

Owen from p. 4

in an uncertain profession.

Yet, a residency is definitely hard work, particularly for those Affiliate Artists who happen to be singers. Owen explained that a residency means two performances each day, five days a week -- approximately four times the amount singers usually perform, due to the strenuous demands of operatic singing.

But for all the work, Owen said that it is a very rewarding experience because of the rapport he can establish with a audience: "The interactions with my audience are so intimate and close--much more personal than larger audiences." He claimed that the most rewarding moment is "seeing an audience come to life when I perform and become involved in what I am doing."

And Owen certainly makes that involvement easy for the listener. His enthusiasm and ability to bring a repertoire to life are truly exciting. For those who have not "experienced" Stephen Owen yet, April 14 is the date to mark on your calendar. For those who have participated in an "informance" with him, the April 14 recital will provide a different setting in which to enjoy Owen's talent.

April 30 KSO concert to feature singer Judy Collins

by KSO Communications

Tickets are on sale now to the Knoxville Symphony Orchestra's April 30 "Saturday Night Pops" concert which will feature popular singing star Judy Collins in the Civic Coliseum.

Tickets are $10, $15, and $25 and are available at the Symphony office, 708 Gay street, 9 a.m.-5 p.m., phone 523-1178. Major credit cards are accepted. Ten-dollar tickets will also be available. metro-area Proffitt's stores and at the Music Isle in the Market Place shopping center on Kingston Pike. Symphony officials report that almost all tables are sold and advise haste in reserving table seating.

The April 30 KSO/Judy Collins "Saturday Night Pops" concert, which will begin at 8:15 p.m., is being sponsored by WBIR-TV and WEZK-FM radio. KSO Music Director Kirk Trevor will conduct the concert. Seating and pre-concert entertainment will begin at 7:30 p.m.

Symphony officials said that Collins will be making a personal appearance from 3-4 p.m. on the day of the concert, April 30, at Davis-Kidd Booksellers, Inc., 2104 Cumberland Ave., to autograph copies of her recently released autobiography and her latest album, both entitled Trust Your Heart. The new LP is Collins' 21st album of her 25-year recording career.

Collins has earned a permanent place in popular music, through million-selling recordings like "Both Sides Now," "Amazing Grace," "Send in the Clowns," and "Suzanne." Through her recording career, she has attracted a loyal following for her blend of music of all stripes -- folk, country, light rock, vintage pop, modern show tunes, and her own original songs. Her choice of material has also helped audiences discover songwriters like Joni Mitchell, Randy Newman, and Leonard Cohen.

When she began recording in 1961, she chose traditional folk material, but soon began exploring contemporaries, including Bob Dylan and Tom Paxton.

Her wide range of interests has always fueled Collins' multi-faceted career. In addition to recording and performing pop music concerts, she has made appearances with many of the world major symphonies, including the London Philharmonic with Andre Previn. She annually performs a Christmas concert at Avery Fisher Hall in New York to rave reviews.

Collins also counts the legitimate stage among her credits. Her attraction to the world of theatre has lead Collins to make popular recordings of show hits by Brel, Brecht, Holmes, Sondheim, and Weill.

well."

Ferrin himself made a similar comment: "I am desirous of more people -- from campus and community -- attending campus events. If only 20 people come to see the president, we will have accomplished something."

Bradley concurred, saying, "A president of a college is, like it or not, a public figure. This is a different kind of public appearance, and one that I hope will serve the college well." In summing up his reasons for being involved in Our Town, Ferrin said of MC, "This college needs to wrestle with how do we become a community...a community of people, not just of scholars." He hopes increased involvement, not just in theatre, but in a variety of activities, and not just on the part of students, but of faculty and administrators as well, will lead to that goal.

Our Town opens April 22 and runs through April 23, 29, and 30.

We can only hope that the ends do indeed justify the means. Even if the helping is done for the wrong reasons, there remains the Personal interaction with people in need can only raise consciousness, making individuals with the power aware of what needs to be done. After the trendiness of the whole concept wears off, maybe there will remain a core of concerned people with the means to do a lot of good.

It would be a shame if the cause became old news and was replaced by another diversion.

I enjoy my share of TV, and I even enjoy some innovative commercials, but continuous play kills the moment for me. If I don't get something the first few times, chances are I missed the bandwagon completely. Who cares if a radio telescope picks up the sound of a worker drinking a Pepsi? Overkill!

The show somehow lost its meaning between figuring out if I do indeed know, "It's no big deal," and deciding whether or not I want a Pepsi. According to the ads, I may just purchase a new Pontiac. ## Summer jobs don't have to be same old routine

by Andi Bristol

Are you tired of going home to the same humdrum job that you do every summer?

This is the time of year when everyone is making plans for the summer. Would you like to see interesting places, meet different people, do something fun, and make money too? Well, it's not too late for you to do just that.

There are plenty of interesting job opportunities for college students in the summer months. For example, you could work at the Space and Rocket Center or as a nanny in the Hamptons or for the EPA in Washington, D.C. or as a wrangler at a dude ranch, or as a counselor in an international camp.

These are just a few exciting opportunities that can be found around the nation and around the world.

Scots start spring practices

by Matt Harrington

Spring is here, and for the Maryville Scots Soccer team that means spring practice. The Scots will be working hard to improve their impressive 1987 outdoor record of 11-6-1 and indoor record of 21-7.

According to coach Phil Neddo, the nucleus of the team is returning for the 1988 fall season. The outcome of the season will depend on the amount of work that the guys put in.

Coach Neddo has named Matthew Grandstrand the 1988 captain of the Scots and said that he is looking for another upperclassman who is setting a positive example to be the co-captain.

So far, this has also been a good recruiting year for the soccer Scots. Ten players have already committed, three of which are very strong.

All in all, coach Neddo seemed very enthusiastic about this year's spring season. Coach Neddo replied, "This is baseball and softball season! Let's go out in our Chevrolet with some apple pie and support the Scots!"

Dismas House encourages people who are interested in learning more about the house to come to dinner and experience it firsthand. "It's a real nice house. Meet some nice people, have dinner," White said when asked what he thought MC students should know about life at Dismas House.

There is also another opportunity to have some hands on experience coming up. There will be a training session for the Decisions Program the weekend of April 22. The Decisions Program works within the correctional system to help prisoners learn how to make decisions, since it is believed that it is errors in this decision-making process that results in crime.

Campuses toughen smoking laws

(CPS) -- A few more campuses adopted tougher smoking rules in recent weeks.

Just after Stanford University announced in early March it would become the first school in the country to ban smoking in most outdoor areas as well as in classrooms, University of Illinois associate Chancellor Richard Wilson said UI might soon extend its smoking bans to all office and reception areas.

In New Orleans, Tulane University's new policy banning smoking in all indoor public areas as well as campus vehicles went into effect in March.

And University of Nebraska-Lincoln deans met March 14 to propose adopting a no-smoking policy for all campus public areas as well as offices used by more than one person.

Nebraska business Dean Gary Schwendiman said he was "surprised" there had "been absolutely no opposition" to the plan, but not everyone is happy about increasingly smokeless American campuses.

On February 25, University of California at Davis students lit up in a Memorial Union protest of a no-smoking policy in a coffee shop in the building.

"We [smokers] pay the same [union] fees as the rest of the student body," smoker Matt Gallagher told The Aggie, Cal-Davis' student paper. "We deserve equal use of the facilities."

Confused? Look at '88 tax changes

by Connie Stinnett

There are several changes under the 1986 Tax Reform Act that may affect a college student's tax return. One of the first changes to be noticed concerns the new filing requirements. Whether a person must file a tax return or not depends on 1) their age, 2) whether they are blind, 3) their gross income, and 4) their filing status. Below are listed minimum gross incomes for each classification of filing status:

Single, under 65, not blind: $4,440.

Single, under 65, blind: $4,900.

Married, filing jointly, both under 65 and not blind: $7,560.

Married, filing jointly, both under 65 and/or both blind: $18,800.

Married, filing separately: $11,900.

Head of household, under 65, not blind: $4,400.

Head of household, under 65, blind: $6,300.

Another change under the new law that may affect students is that of personal exemption. Their personal exemption has increased from $1,080 to $1,900 for 1987. However, if a person is claimed as a dependant on some else's return, he or she cannot take a personal exemption.

A third change that may affect students is the standard deduction. The standard deduction for someone who is not claimed on another person's return is $2,540 for a single person and $3,760 for a married couple filing jointly. However, anyone who is claimed as an exemption on another person's return must calculate their own standard deduction.

A final change that may affect the college community are the topics of scholarships and fellowships. Under the new law, for grants that were made August 16, 1986, Degree candidates may not exclude room and board or travel from income. Tuition and books may still be deducted for a degree candidate. However, for a non-degree candidate, no deduction is allowed.

The changes listed above are only a few of the changes found in the 1986 Tax Reform Act. More information may be found in our library or in any local library or may be obtained from the IRS upon request.

Library broken into

Some time between 4:15 p.m. on April 2 and 11:00 a.m. on April 3, someone broke into the library through a rear entrance and stole approximately 30 dollars, according to an MC security report.

The report also stated, "Diane Brandsborg's (circulation assistant) desk was forced open. There was a pair of broken scissors lying on the floor which had apparently been used to gain entry [to the desk]. Joan Worley's (director of the library) and Sherry LeCompte's (secretary) desk drawers had been pulled out."

Even though only 30 dollars, mostly in change, was taken, the cost of replacing the broken glass panes on the door, the means by which the burglar used to gain entrance, will be much more, but the exact cost at this time has not yet been determined.

"We're going to make some changes," said Worley. "Either a different type of glass or chicken wire. Anything to make entry more difficult. We are reviewing the alternatives. Other than that there doesn't seem to be much else we can do."

There are no suspects as of yet, but the investigation will continue.

organizations, students, workers, and the unions, the people have responded throughout Central America by openly defying their governments' continued human rights violations -- economic and civil. Nowhere has their pressure been greater than in El Salvador.

The people's pressure, combined with growing opposition at home, has found the Reagan administration desperate for a success in Central America generally and El Salvador particularly. The failure of the contra; concentration camps in Guatemala, Honduras, and El Salvador; and economic bankruptcy at home all place greater pressure on the administration to produce an event the American people can rally around. Only the testimony of Father Alas and those who've lived amongst the terror Reagan inherited have sabotaged his administration's well-laid plans.

Father Alas' struggle, like that of many who strive against poverty and injustice, is not without costs: after being tortured, drugged, and left for dead on a mountaintop, Father Alas went into exile in 1977. His devotion to democratic reform and social justice for Salvadorans caused Dr. Charles Clements, in his book A Witness to War to remark that "Father Alas' legacy is the campesinos' dignity and self-esteem."

Find out why "democracy" in Central America as defined by the right-wing is an euphemism for state terror; dare to hear the other side of the centuries-old struggle for Central American independence; hear Chencho's story of the people's courage and dignity!

Day celebrates Scots heritage

by Lynn King

Need something to break the Saturday monotony? Would you be interested in an English country fair, complete with croquet, cricket, and English country dancers? If that sounds appealing, you don't have to go any further than Dogwood Day at Maryville College.

A one-day event, the second annual Dogwood Day at MC begins at 9 a.m. tomorrow morning. The focus is on the British-Scottish heritage of Maryville College, and Chairman Lew Rudisill encourages the campus community to take this opportunity to celebrate spring and the Dogwood Arts Festival at MC. According to Rudisill, the event was highly successful last year. "We were really playing it by ear last year. It was just a lot of fun!" she said.

One of the main events planned for Dogwood Day is an appearance by "Lark in the Morn," a group of English country dancers based in Knoxville and Oak Ridge. They will dance in the afternoon behind the P.E. Building.

A cricket match will begin on the football practice field around 11 a.m. Macawber Engineering and Wyco will sponsor teams.

One of last year's most popular events which will be repeated this year is the "Sheep-to-Shawl" demonstration. The Wilderness Weavers Guild, a local organization, will demonstrate all steps in the creation of wool, from shearing sheep to carding, dyeing, and spinning.

Also planned is a quilt show sponsored by the local chapter of Beta Sigma Phi. The show will be held in the Alumni Gym from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m.

MACCO will sponsor a fundraising croquet tournament beginning at 10 a.m. Participants are asked to follow the British custom of dressing all in white for the tournament, and cucumber sandwiches and lemonade will be served afterward. Members of the campus community as well as people in the surrounding community will be involved. "We would really like to encourage the campus community to get

Wilks to take season
'one game at a time'

by Bill Householder

With the resignation of Head Coach Larry Stephens back in February, the future of MC football seemed uncertain, even bleak. Now a new face with very positive ideas has come to turn bleak into bright.

Phil Wilks, formerly of Wofford College in South Carolina, was chosen to replace Stephens after a long search. Already, many of the members of the football team and others of the coaching staff find Wilks to be a very positive influence on the football program. Athletic Director Randy Lambert said that he feels fortunate to have someone with such a vast background in small college football. Vast indeed! Since graduating with a B.A. in Physical Education in 1970 and a M.A. in Educational Administration in 1974 from Marshall University, Wilks has coached around a large part of the Middle and Southeastern regions.

Starting at his high school alma mater, Chesapeake High School in Ohio, he was assistant football coach and head junior varsity coach from 1970 to 1973. From there he went back to Marshall University in West Virginia, where he was graduate assistant football coach from 1973 to 1974. He was defensive coordinator and head track coach at Georgetown College in Kentucky from 1976 to 1979; defensive end and linebacker coach at Newberry College in South Carolina from 1979 to 1984 and assistant head coach and defensive coordinator at Wofford College from 1985 to the present.

What ideas does the new head football coach have in store for next football season? "Take every game one at a time and go into that game with the idea that we can win... and improve as much as we can from this past season.... So we're going to just do as well as we can do next year and try to keep improving." Wilks added, "I've tried to tell them [the players] and everyone else that it's not going to happen overnight. It's going to take time and hard work. We're just going to go into next season with the idea that every week we're going to go into the game as well-prepared and as well-conditioned as we possibly can and we're going to play as well as we can. If we can do that, next season will take care of itself."

Why Maryville and not some other college? Wilks said there are many reasons why he chose Maryville, but "I didn't want to move just anywhere in the country just to take a head coaching job... It was important to me that I got into an area that both my family and myself would enjoy.... When I came I understood that... the public school system here [was] excellent" which "was important to me." He concluded, "I knew the area would be a good area for the family."

Explore education beyond classroom

Education is a very important part of self-development. That statement applies to almost everyone -- it's all in how one interprets "education."

Most people at MC probably feel that formal education -- a more complex version of the three "R's" -- is important or they wouldn't be in college in the first place, and certainly not in one that stresses an overall "liberal arts" education.

Formal education, however, is not the last word. Other types of education are also very important and will have lasting effects, tangible or intangible.

Travel is one of the most important. The most mind-broadening kind of travel is, of course, visiting other countries and cultures. No amount of studying can compete with the richness of experiencing a language and a society firsthand; culture just won't fit inside the pages of a book.

MC offers "study abroad" programs; you may want to talk to your advisor or to students who have studied overseas (i.e., Kristi Self and Nancy Phillips). Various universities and organizations regularly offer study programs in Europe and the Far East. You may even come across some in Africa and Latin America. These are worth looking into.

There are other ways of visiting other countries: student tours, personal travel, even off-campus interims. It is not necessary to travel under the auspices of a particular institution, although that sometimes makes it easier.

The obvious drawback to travel abroad is the cost. There are, however, ways of cutting travel and lodging expenses -- airline specials, hostels, etc. The adage "Where there's a will, there's a way" usually applies.

Even if you can't make it to the foreign land of your choice, there are second-best alternatives.

You could get to know a culture by getting to know a member of that culture, without ever leaving campus. MC students come from such geographically and culturally diverse areas as Norway, Japan, Malaysia, and Venezuela. There's a lot to be learned just by talking to someone who grew up speaking a different language and adhering to different customs.

You could also travel around within this country. The culture and atmospheres of, for instance, New York City and Key West are very different. If you're from the Midwest, visit New England; if you're from the Deep South, visit the Southwest, or any region different from your own.

This country is famed for being a patchwork of cultural groups and regional characteristics. Experience some of that.

Travel is just one type of education outside the classroom, but it is one of the most beneficial.

The beauty of this type of education is that it's as fun and exciting as it is rewarding.

'Talk Show' panelists discuss racism at MC

by Lissa McCleod

Racism -- for many students today this is a topic of the '60s bringing to mind stories of race riots, civil disobedience, lunch counters, and busing. But it is also a timely issue in the '80s with a growing number of "racial incidents" throughout the country, particularly at institutions of higher education.

At MC race relations has been a very live topic in recent years even as the number of black students here declines. Also, the number of foreign students on campus continues to increase, bringing with it other questions of racism.

In an attempt to encourage dialogue on this topic and to bring it to the attention of the MC community, the Peace Education Task Force sponsored the "Dean Bolden Talk Show" on April 14, 1988. The show followed the format that Donahue and the Oprah Winfrey Show use, with Dean Bolden as moderator and eight student/staff panelists. Following an introduction by each panelist, all of the audience was invited to participate in the discussion.

The "show" began with a definition of racism as the belief that a group (defined racially) is innately inferior, leading to discrimination against and exploitation of this group. Most of the panelists agreed with panelist Joe Johnson, who made the distinction between blatant, overt racism and institutional or covert racism. While the more overt forms of racism have been apparent at MC in the past, the predominant form of racism encountered at MC is the more subtle one. Johnson feels much of the subtle racism occurs by very well-meaning people, unaware that they are offending with their "compliments."

As panelist Aundra Ware said, "When someone tells me 'You are the best black friend (or student) that I have,' it isn't saying much when there are only 10 black students on campus. Just say you are the best friend (or student) I have." Dr. John see Racism, p.5

Don't let year-end blahs get you down

by Craig Farmer

The end of the year is here, and if you're not insane by now, you will be. Tying up all those loose ends and finishing up the year seems impossible, huh? The pressure begins to build up in your head and you think you're going to die! It seems you just can't win for losing.

You're hoping you can give eye contact in class, but your head just keeps sagging; you hope that you remembered to feed your goldfish, but he just keeps floating at the top of the bowl. When you finally get time to be with the one you love, you hope you can stay awake. The strange way your roommate seems to sleep in garbage is making you sick! Your professors seem to be talking about important stuff, but all you can think about is lying in the sun.

Your head begins to pound and you call your parents for support, but all they keep telling you is how hard you are going to have to work this summer. You go to Dobb's for that comforting dinner, but you're not really sure what's in it! You don't even have enough time to participate in the non-stop, nighttime activities on campus. You go to Spanish drill, but you just can't conjugate the "berbs." The work just seems to pile up and you can't imagine doing it all again next year.

Although the times are hard, it all seems to work out in the end somehow. "Don't take life too seriously, or it will pass you by," is an important motto.

Take time out for study breaks, like maybe streaking across campus or having a conversation with one of the campus squirrels. Remember to keep your chin up, and let's not forget those prayers to get us through the day.

Day care helps students

(OCR) -- These days, more and more college students divide their time between home, school and work. They're not just some unique students; they're professionals. And there are more of them every year.

Out of this growing population of returning adult students emerges the demand for a whole new set of services, not the least of which is child care. While many schools have set up campus day-care facilities, many more might profit from the University of Minnesota's and Columbian Basin College's example: they're offering day-care subsidies so students can take their children to the facility of their choice.

"Student-parents should have the freedom of choosing day-care facilities; it's hard enough to juggle school, work, and family responsibilities without having to worry about day-care," said Ann Wilson, coordinator of Columbia Basin's child-care reimbursement program.

But the similarities between the two programs end with day-care subsidies. Columbia's program, funded by student association and operated by the student affairs office, divides up about $10,800 a year. If they qualify, students can receive $50 a month to help for child care. About 47 students received grants this year.

"We realize that $50 is just a 'drop in the bucket' when compared to actual day-care costs," said Wilson, but she knew from the beginning that we wanted to help as many students as possible with the money we had."

Minnesota's program, however, is the model. Last year, the state legislature appropriated money for child-care subsidies at all state public colleges and universities. For the next two years, UM will dispense $55,000 in grants for child-care. But here's the real treat: the grants cover the students' entire day-care costs, which, in most cases, amount to $2,000 to $2,500 a year.

When students apply for a grant, the university determines their academic

Task force makes recommendations

by Janine Smerl

The meeting of the Task Force on Alcohol and Residency Policies on April 6 yielded no new recommendations for the Board of Directors. However, according to Dr. Harry Howard, chairman of the task force, some new guidelines were put forth concerning students of legal drinking age.

According to Howard, reducing the age requirement for living off-campus to 21 is under consideration. He cited the fact that those students of legal drinking age will probably not want to be affected by the college's alcohol policy.

Howard also said that more of the measures stated in the task force bulletins posted around the campus were adopted at Wednesday's meeting.

On the task force are students Jon Allison, Wendi Jo Medlin, and Kristi Self; staff members Phil Neddo, Bruce Guillaume, and Jane Richardson and faculty members Carolyn Cuddy and Robert Ranger.

The task force has no freshman members. Freshman class president Michael Moore said of this issue, "I find it very hypocritical. They said they wanted to give us representation; they said they wanted to give us equal voice, and then they don't even put a freshman on the task force."

The freshman class is of particular importance to the alcohol issue because it is the largest body on campus and, of the students currently enrolled, it will have to live with the alcohol policy the longest.

MC president Richard I. Ferrin commented on the difficulty of selecting the task force members:

"When you try to put together a committee, there are people who say 'I wasn't represented.'"

When questioned about the reasons for the older students being selected, Ferrin said, "I wanted students who would be living with the policy, but who were seasoned at the institution."

Wilks

He also said that Maryville's a good place to be because it's not too far from Knoxville, the nearest metropolitan city; he said, "That means you're not in the big city, yet you're not so far away from everything that you can't get to places to do things. I like the location as far as lakes and the mountains and different recreational type activities."

Speaking of his family, he has two children -- Amy, age three, and Scott, age six -- and his wife Lisa. Scott, who'll be starting first grade next year, likes Maryville College because, Wilks said, they're the "Fighting Scots."

Aside from football, Wilks said that some of his favorite pastimes include fishing, hunting, swimming, and scuba diving. He's a certified scuba diver and had certification to be a swimming instructor/teacher in Kentucky. He doesn't get to hunt much since he started coaching because the hunting seasons and football season usually conflict with each other.

Another aspect that attracted Wilks to Maryville was the college campus. "I was impressed with the campus; I think it's a pretty campus. I think the facilities are nice and that you can recruit people to come to this location and this campus with these facilities. I was [also] real impressed with Coach Lambert and Dr. Ferrin."

They are also impressed with him. Lambert said that the more he's around Wilks the more impressed he gets: "He's doing an excellent job in recruiting and should have a positive attitude on the football program down the road." He said that Wilks believes in discipline and communication, and he believes that this will have a positive impact throughout the campus.

"I know they'll [Lambert and Dr. Ferrin] do all they can do within their power to help me, as well as ... the rest of the coaches with their programs," Wilks said; "I think that's all you can ask for."

Of the team itself,

Wilks said, "I've been real impressed with the young men that have remained on the football squad.... We want them to stay...., on the squad, and work toward a degree and graduate."

Many of the football players think highly of Wilks. Ryan Tipton, freshman, said Wilks "...seems excited about what he's doing." Another freshman, Jay Mallone, said Wilks "...seems the type of guy to have an open mind."

Wilks said, "If you let negative thoughts come into your head, then pretty soon you're negative about everything. Why worry about what we have; do the best with it, and if we're successful, it doesn't matter what we have.... You can't dwell on things you can't control." He mentioned that his philosophy is similar to the Alcoholics Anonymous prayer: "God grant me the strength to change the things I can, the courage to accept those things I can't change, and the wisdom to know the difference."

He also believes, as a coach, that you need to just be yourself. He believes a coach needs to coach his personality because that's all the players want, for a coach to be up front with them. He does say he will scream and yell if that's what it takes, but thinks players at Maryville, because of the high academic standards, don't need to be pushed and pushed, that they're already pretty self-motivated.

He believes that the players need to show respect for other programs on campus. "If you place yourself over here," he said, "away from everybody else and say we're better than everybody else, that we deserve this and that, then I think you're making a big mistake." He wants the college to support the team, and at the same time he wants the team to support other programs on campus. There are two sides to the player, he said: what they are on the field and what they are off the field, but once you're off, you have to learn to channel your aggression more constructively, especially once you get out into the world.

Phil Wilks seems to be a positive and influential individual whose positive influence will strengthen not only the "Scots" but the whole of MC as well.

Senior photography exhibit displays experimentation

by Lissa McCleod

This month's art exhibit is a display of senior Jennifer Chastain's photography.

Much of her exhibit involves experimental techniques that she has explored in the past couple of years. While the range of subjects includes outdoor scenes and objects, the predominant focus of the photographs is on live models. The photos in the exhibit have been enhanced by many different techniques to get a different perspective on the subjects.

Perhaps the most interesting effects Chastain achieves are through the use of a texture screen and a photo silk screen.

The texture screen creates a mosaic-like quality from an image that was originally dull. Chastain has used this technique for two of her prints.

The photo silk screen has been used in several different capacities -- printing on cloth and printing with several different colors. In some cases, the resulting image does not appear to be a photograph.

Chastain also displays photographs that have been enhanced with oil colors, an acid-etched copper scene on paper, and a print from handcut paper stencils done with pastels.

A technique that Chastain claims is new for this semester is that of weaving photographs together. Her untitled leaves work (1988) was made from two identical pictures of leaves -- one cut in horizontal strips, the other cut in vertical strips. The strips were then woven together to create an effect of movement in several different directions.

Chastain's models are mostly "local" ones, including MC students Selena Dockery, Rae Ann Hickman, and Karen Schubert. Chastain explains that these models were easy to work with and

When working with live models, Chastain said, "You have an idea of what you want, but it changes as you work with it [the models]. The finished product is always different [than the original conception]."

Chastain has organized the exhibit by color and is happy with the way it has turned out and how it fills the gallery.

If there is a common theme of the show, it is that of experimentation -- an appropriate one for a liberal arts degree.

There is a wide range of photographic experiments displayed in this show, from the traditional photograph to prints that do not even seem to come from a camera. Chastain described the exhibit, saying, "It's all experiments. There are lots of different processes touched on."

The show will be at the FAC through April 25, 1988.

Commons Six: Elegant cinema

by Jennifer C. Worth

What could be better than sitting down to watch a good movie in your comfy living room, with a bowl of butter-laden popcorn at hand?

Not much can compete, except maybe going out to see a good movie in a plush theatre with comfy seats, a great sound system, and real butter for the popcorn.

The elegant cinema is not going the way of the full-service carwash and the Wurlitzer jukebox -- at least not if the Cineplex Odeon chain has anything to do with it. Over the past few years, this chain has aimed at making going to the movies a pleasurable experience; the motivating idea is that a theatre is a place to enjoy movies, not merely to see them.

A new Cineplex Odeon theatre -- the Commons Six Cinemas -- is now open in Knoxville, at 227 North Peters Boulevard; it's in the same shopping center as the new Circuit City (there's a sign on Kingston Pike).

The Commons Six is definitely worth the trip and the five-dollar admission, both comparable to UA East Towne. The parking is plentiful.

In addition to such luxuries as a chic marble lobby and large, attractive restrooms, the Commons Six offers Dolby Sound Systems in four cinemas and ample seating: four screens with 150 seats each and two with 250 each. Each pair of smaller ones can be combined to show the same movie simultaneously on both screens.

As for the cinemas themselves not only are they roomy, but they also have very large screens, cozy (not perfect, but definitely above average) seats, and tasteful decor (what a switch from Foothills Cinemas). They even have curtains that are raised before the screening.

All this may not sound like much if you've bought into the 80's cinema ennui, fed by the popularity of VCRs and the growth of impersonal mega-cineplexes.

Chaucer revisited

Heather Farrar

The Wife of Bath (Liz Prior) shows her fifth husband (Jeff Wallace) who's boss, in one of The Canterbury Tales' most famous segments. The MC Playmakers presented a "reader's theatre" version of three of the Tales during dinner on Saturday, April 16, as part of the Parents' Weekend activities.

Hairspray finds perfect blend

by Jennifer C. Worth

A perfect movie is as rare as a perfect diamond. It is very difficult to find just the right balance of character and plot, just the right blend of light and heavy. The perfect movie should have something to say, but not be boring about it.

Sometimes these qualities turn up in the most unlikely of places. Like, for instance, John Waters' latest film, Hairspray.

What? A tacky trek by the man who brought us Polyester and who made Divine a star? Yep.

Hairspray is loads of fun, spoofing the music (remember the Du-tones?), the dancing (remember the Madison?), the hairstyles (remember the bouffant?), and the attitudes of the early '60s. The music, dances, and hairstyles have changed (thank goodness), but a lot of the attitudes haven't.

For instance, when a teen is caught dating a black, her parents come after her with a straitjacket, bar her in her room, and submit her to the "care" of a psycho-psychiatrist (played by Waters himself).

The plot revolves around chubby Tracy Turnblad, who takes a local dance show -- and the entire Baltimore teen scene -- by storm. It's about time the movies showed us someone who looks like she actually goes to a high school with the rest of the mortals becoming popular beyond the dreams of youth.

Tracy and friends -- the teen-idol Link, the hip Seaweed, and the meek Penny -- succeed not only in dethroning the snobbish princess Amber but also in segregating Baltimore television. They have a lot of fun, too.

In addition to the leads, each of whom seems perfectly cast, there are some wonderful supporting roles: Debbie Harry (of Blondie fame) as Amber's snobbish, demanding mother; Sonny Bono as her obsequious father; Divine in a dual role as Tracy's blue-collar mother and as WZZT's bigoted station manager; and Ric Ocasek and Pia Zadora as a pair of beatniks. (Zadora teaches Tracy and Penny to rebel by ironing their hair instead of rattling it.)

Any review of Hairspray is necessarily sketchy. It's nearly impossible to do justice to even a fraction of the funny moments, and harder still to recapture the exuberant spirit of the film.

Hairspray is not to be missed. It's nostalgia, it's biting satire, it's camp -- somehow all rolled into one. Knoxville News-Sentinel film critic Betsy Pickle granted Hairspray a rare five-star rating; I agree with her.

Perry also agreed that he had received comments from other faculty members that were meant to compliments, but came out as subtly racist remarks.

While Johnson gives people the benefit of assuming their racism as well-meaning and ignorance, Kelly Franklin, director of the English program and panelist, has seen more caustic remarks directed towards foreign students because of their race. He says that often the lack of English communication skills in exchange students is mistaken for intellectual inferiority. He was quick to add, however, that there are many students at MC that go out of their way to make students from other countries feel at home here.

Panelist Kayoko Nagakura questioned whether racism or a lack of cultural understanding creates a separation between many American students and foreign exchange students. Student Philip Perez is concerned about increasing tendencies in students toward ethnocentricity and ignorance of international concerns.

Many of the panelists pointed to education as the solution for racism. Ware pointed out that at a predominantly white college like MC, black and foreign students are forced to confront their preconceptions of white people and to become educated in white culture, but that the educational process is not reversed. She recommends more black faculty and students as well as formal education for white students.

Johnson agreed, saying, "There is room for improvement on campus (in race relations). The college should move towards education, maybe in the area of the Social Sciences" for the solution.

Emily (Francie K. Ayers, far left) tries vainly to make contact with her parents (Murray Kosmin and Jennifer C. Worth) in act III of Our Town.

Our Town opens

Our Town opens Friday night, April 22, at 8:15. Performances will continue April 23, 29, and 30. Admission is free to MC students with I.D. Tickets are $4 for adults, $2 for students and senior citizens.

The classic Thornton Wilder play opened 50 years ago on Broadway; it won the 1938 Pulitzer Prize for Drama.

Although it is often considered a mushy, sentimental play, a Time magazine reviewer said in 1938 of the original production, "The emotional climate is just right: warm, but dry." Director Frank Bradley said that he is aiming for a similar climate, avoiding over-sentimentality.

John Anderson, in The Saturday Review of Literature in April 1938, said that Our Town "touches the common denominator of American life and expands the family album into a history of the world."

Movies, from p.4

But if you enjoy seeing movies as a complete experience, enriched by lots of noticeable, if small, details, then the Commons Six awaits you.

Even if you don't care about the details, the Commons Six is still for you, for it offers six movies at a competitive price. Their opening slate of films is very promising: epic Best Picture winner The Last Emperor; best picture nominee Broadcast News; Wall Street, starring Best Actor Michael Douglas; critically acclaimed new film Stand and Deliver; Agatha Christie's Appointment with Death; romantic Western Return to Snowy River; and last but not least, pop spoof Hairspray.

Go to Commons Six. Go for the atmosphere or just for the movies, but go. The ad proclaims, "Going to the movies will never be the same again!" They may be on to something.

involved in this," Rudisill said.

The cost of playing in the tournament is $7. Contact Sandy Murphy at 983-3512 or 984-6732 for information or to register.

Another truly British event will be the gathering of the British Car Club, a local group. The cars will be on display on the lot behind Pearsons until 4 p.m. Saturday; students are reminded not to park there beginning Friday night.

According to Rudisill, Dogwood Day is a great opportunity for campus-community interaction, in addition to being a unique event and a lot of fun. "You have to commit yourself to something," she said. "That's what this is an opportunity to do."

Group sponsors commencement pledge

by the Graduation Pledge Alliance

Concerned students are alive, well, and active in the 1980's. At Humboldt State University (HSU) in northern California, they are facing and discussing issues of social and environmental responsibility in employment choices.

HSU students, who last year successfully campaigned for a voluntary pledge of responsibility in job decisions to be included in their commencement ceremonies, have formed the Graduation Pledge Alliance (GPA) and are carrying their idea to schools around the world.

The pledge handed to HSU graduates states, "I pledge to thoroughly investigate and take into account the social and environmental consequences of any job opportunity I consider."

It is intended to "help create an atmosphere where social and environmental responsibility is openly discussed and plays a more central role in our life decisions," according to pledge co-author Matt Nicodemus.

"The pledge statement is kind of what education is all about," said Mark Murray, former HSU student body president. "We become educated men and women so we can go on and act in a responsible manner."

Nicodemus believes the pledge gives local activists a powerful tool: "Now we can focus public discussion directly on questions of what it actually means to be responsible and which employers are being more or less so."

Already, students at 11 U.S. universities and colleges are actively campaigning for similar pledges to be an official part of their 1988 graduation ceremonies. These schools include Stanford University (Stanford, California), University of California (Berkeley), University of California Santa Cruz, San Francisco State University, University of Utah (Salt Lake City), and Evergreen State University (Olympia, Washington).

In addition, students at nearly 40 other schools across the country, including several high schools, have expressed interest in offering students responsibility pledges at graduation time.

GPA recently published a pledge-organizing manual and has publicized it to over 3,000 U.S. university student governments.

The organizing manual is available for a $2.00 donation from GPA at PO Box 4439, Arcata, CA 95521.

The pledge has had enough of a positive impact at Humboldt that on February 8 the student government resolved to encourage that the pledge be offered to all of the school's future graduates.

A variety of activities stemming from the pledge drive have evolved at HSU. Students from HSU's art department are organizing a spring art show that will draw upon the themes embodied in the pledge statement.

An April 16 forum on military-related occupations will bring together a Pentagon official, a nuclear weapons designer, a physicist who quit making nuclear weapons out of conscience, and an outspoken antiwar activist professor for a discussion of careers and conscience.

Classes in "Critical Thinking" have been assigned essay questions that ask how students might obtain and assess information about social and environmental impacts of jobs.

At the instigation of a concerned student, the chemistry department has taken steps to better educate students about proper means of disposing laboratory wastes.

Some schools may choose not to coordinate campaigns to call for a formal inclusion of the pledge in this year's commencement ceremonies but will instead

Mock convention nominates Dukakis

Lexington, Va. (CPS) -- Massachusetts Governor Michael Dukakis was nominated as the Democratic presidential candidate, and Tennessee Senator Albert Gore will be his running mate.

The Democratic national convention won't be held until July, of course, but if history repeats itself, Dukakis will get the nod. Dukakis, after all was nominated as the presidential candidate at the Washington and Lee University Mock Democratic Convention March 25 and 26.

The student-run convention has a knack for picking winners. Since its inception in 1908, "delegates" have correctly predicted the eventual nominee for the party that's out of the White House 13 out of 18 times. That run includes selecting eight of the last nine candidates since 1948.

Convention treasurer Brad Watkins, a Washington and Lee senior, attributes the convention's success to its "emphasis on solid political research."

"It's one of the greatest political research efforts in the country," he said. "It gets people interested in the political process, and helps them appreciate the pros and be more tolerant of the cons."

"We talk to grassroots party organizers at county and local levels to formulate a well-thought platform," said Watkins.

More than 80 percent of Washington and Lee's student body participates in the convention, and students from other Virginia colleges and high schools participate as well. Blocks of delegates are assigned regions of the nation to research to determine which candidate appeals to voters there.

Jesse Jackson, said Watkins, ran a strong second at the convention, but most felt he was not electable and won't be nominated by the Democrats in July. He will be, Watkins predicted, "a powerbroker for the poor and disadvantaged," and will have a significant influence on the party's platform.

"Despite his success, in most states Jackson is only receiving 10 percent of the white vote," said Watkins. "You need more to be elected president. The Democrats have not performed well in the last two elections, so they'll do everything they can this time to have an attractive candidate."

Dukakis, said Watkins, runs very close to Vice President George Bush, the likely Republican candidate, in national polls, which may be the factor that gives him the real nomination in July.

"Dukakis is truly a national candidate," said Watkins. "He will be the nominee."

Japanese offered

from Susquehanna Communications

Japanese is the foreign language rising fastest in popularity among college students today, and for good reason. Japan offers great riches to young Americans: fascinating history, elegant traditions, booming economic frontiers, and a culture unique in its blend of Oriental and Western ways.

From July 28 to August 19, Susquehanna University, Selinsgrove, Pennsylvania, will offer an intensive program in Japanese language and culture. Ninety hours of instruction will consist of five hours of language class daily, taught by native Japanese instructors using progressive, dynamic methods and materials. Students will earn four transferable semester hours of credit.

Language learning will be complemented by presentations on the culture behind the language. In addition, weekend trips to New York City and Washington, D.C., will help students discover Japanese culture in the United States.

American students will share a residence hall with twenty-four Japanese students from Tokyo's Senshu University, who will be studying English language and American culture. Contact with Japanese students will provide unlimited opportunities to make friends for a lifetime.

A fee of $1400 includes 90 hours of instruction, lodging in a dormitory, three meals a day, and two overnight trips. Contact Dr. Susan Johnson, Susquehanna University, Selinsgrove, PA 17870, Telephone (717) 374-0101 for application forms and information. Applications are due by July 1, 1988.

Schools use football to boost image

(CPS) -- To boost their public profiles and shrinking enrollments, several small Midwest colleges in recent weeks have adopted an unusual strategy: they've decided to field football teams.

A California junior college, moreover, announced it may go to court to keep its nationally-ranked football squad for the same reasons.

Baseball Scots aim for ODAC

by Matt Harrington

For the Maryville College baseball team the season is winding down and the Scots are setting their sights on the O.D.A.C. (Old Dominion Athletic Conference) tournament beginning April 27.

This is the last year in the O.D.A.C., so they want to go out in style -- by winning it.

According to freshman pitcher Mike Beal, "If we play up to our potential we can win the tournament, but for us to win, our pitching, hitting, and fielding must all come together at once."

The Scots, who were 10-18 coming into this week, played Warren Wilson College on Monday and Tusculum

Officials at Trinity College, a church-affiliated Illinois school that enrolls about 600 students, announced in early March they will field a football team in 1989.

It will be the first time Trinity has had a team in its 91-year history.

The reason, Trinity spokesman Bob Moeller said, will be to win students as much as to win football games.

"We have to do what we can to be competitive with other small, church-affiliated, liberal arts colleges in the area," Moeller explained. "We're all competing for a shrinking pool of students."

Another Illinois school, Greenville College, started a team last fall after 94 years without a gridiron squad. The team did well on the field its first season, and according to school officials, helped attract dozens of new students by giving the school a larger public profile.

Greenville's success, said Moeller, encouraged Trinity, which suffered through financial hard times in recent years but has since rebounded.

"I think people will see it as another sign that Trinity is healthy and doing well after a period of some trouble," he said.

A 1984 University of Kentucky study indicated a strong correlation between winning sports programs and athletic donations, but no significant relation between sports and academic gifts.

And when Wichita State University dropped its debt-ridden football program in 1988, applications, enrollment and donations actually increased.

Scots football works for winning season

by Bret Fincher

The 1988 off-season football program is underway and in full force. The team is working hard five days a week in preparation for a winning campaign in the upcoming season. If the hard work in the training room is any indication of things to come, then supporters and alumni of the Scots program should definitely get their money's worth when football time rolls around again.

The team starts by working in the weight room three times a week. The other two days, they can be found in the gym at 6:30 a.m. This rigorous off-season work shows that the team is dedicated to turning things around for themselves as well as the school and the town. The players and coaches are determined to make MC a team to be reckoned with in the future.

New Head Football Coach Phil Wilks said, "I can't give a specific time on when the program will be turned around for good. There is no timetable. It will take a lot of commitment from both the coaches and the players. We have to keep both around here long enough to learn everything. Our goal is to get better each time we play, and the program will be moving forward. I would never have come here if I didn't see the potential to get better."

The Scots' 1988 team will be young but should have quite a bit of experience. They will return only one senior, but several of the returning sophomores and juniors received substantial playing time last season.

Hank Snyder, next season's lone senior, summed up best the outlook for 1988. He said, "I don't think we can have a winning season unless we have a winning attitude. It's too easy to lose, and that's what we've been doing for at least five years now. It's going to take a special kind of commitment and dedication for us to win. We first have to believe that we can win before it will happen."

Football, from p.7

Hartsook, Wichita State's vice-president for development and alumni affairs, years for the visibility a good football team can bring to a school.

"Right now I miss not being able to have a chance at good visibility in the fall," he said. "I'd like to have had Sunday headlines that said 'Wichita State Wins' this fall."

In California, Taft College may go to court to keep such headlines, and its football team, alive.

The school -- which easily won its conference championship last year and finished the season ranked third in the nation among junior colleges -- was left out when the Coast Valley Conference reorganized earlier this year.

Conference officials say they assumed the state Commission on Athletics would place Taft in a more competitive league.

But the state didn't, forcing Taft officials to scramble to schedule games for the 1988 season. "It's difficult," said spokesman Dennis McCall, "since most schools have already scheduled their seasons."

The school is exploring the feasibility of joining other conferences, McCall said, but may sue the Commission on Athletics to place it in a conference if Taft cannot arrange games on its own. If the football program dies, said Taft President David Cothrun, the entire college would suffer.

"It is quite vital that we not lose the 40 or so students that we would lose with the end of the football program. We would lose more than just students," said Cothrun. "We would possibly never recover. Once enrollment at a college drops, growth is limited."

Pledge, from p.6

find other times to hand out pledges to graduating students. Last year, for example, a coalition of students at the University of Vermont made employment information available to fellow students outside of their commencement exercises.

"We can find appropriate employment alternatives through constructive questioning and research," emphasized GPA member Bill Ihne. "That is what the pledge is about: taking an initiative to find employment that is meaningfully helping our communities and society to maintain a healthy environment for all involved."

Now "Mike Mouse" works in a factory assembly line and pokes fun at careerism and '80s nihilism.

eligibility (they must attend full time, have at least a 2.0 GPA, and fall within certain income levels) and the county verifies their income status, says Krick. The entire process takes about 30 days. If approved, parents can enroll their children in any licensed day-care facility, which, in turn, bills the non-AFDC program at UM.

"Parents can also have the child-care provider come into their home; the program will pay for that," said Krick, "and that's especially nice for students who go to school at night. The kids can go to sleep in their own beds."

However, while

Columbia Basin's program has too many applicants for the amount of money available, UM's program -- like those at other Minnesota schools -- has excess money. Krick blames the situation on a lack of publicity. She's having difficulty locating people who qualify for the program. So far, only 20 students have received grants.

Frisbee, Aerobie fight on college scene

(CPS) -- Racial tensions. South Africa. U.S. policy in Central America. College reform. Escalating tuitions. CIA campus recruiting.

There has, in short, been no shortage of issues on American campuses this spring, but none may have affected so many collegians on a daily basis as the Battle Of What To Throw During Study Breaks.

The Frisbee, for decades arguably the most visible sign of spring on campuses, is being challenged for students' affection by a relatively new toy: the Aerobie.

"Since I brought the fantastic Aerobie on campus, it has been the center of attention. In fact, my fraternity's Frisbees are covered with cobwebs," Kirk Phillips, a University of Missouri-Rolla student, wrote in a letter to Superflight Inc., the California Aerobie manufacturer.

"When a Frisbee dreams, it dreams it's an Aerobie," added Peter Weyhrauch, a student at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Still, Superflight and Wham-o, which manufactures Frisbees, see their products as complementing, rather than competing with, each other.

While Aerobies -- which are thin plastic rings that look like Frisbees without centers -- can soar much farther than Frisbees, says Superflight President Alan Adler, the engineer who developed the flying ring, they're not good for traditional disk sports such as Frisbee golf or ultimate Frisbee.

"Most use them for a game of catch," said Adler. "They go too far for golf or ultimate."

"They're different. They're not mutually exclusive," said Scott Zimmerman, a California State Polytechnic University student who's one of the top disk players in the nation. "It's not a legitimate comparison."

The Aerobie, said

Zimmerman, "is a little more forgiving. It flies straighter with less effort."

Zimmerman should know. He set a Guinness World Record in 1985 when he threw an Aerobie 1,125 feet, longer than three football fields lined up end to end.

Purists, however, disdain Aerobies for "serious" disk sports. "You could use an Aerobie for golf," he said, "but it would change the sport."

"Serious enthusiasts have both" toys, claims Dan Roddick, Wham-o's director of sport promotion, "I don't know anybody who says they favor one over the other."

Yet Adler, a

Stanford engineering instructor who invented Aerobie in the mid-1970s, is trying to lure Frisbee devotees to new, specialized Aerobie competitions.

Superflight, for instance, is sponsoring The Great Aerobie Anecdote Contest. Contestants who come up with the best Aerobie tall tales and stories -- fact and fiction -- will win synthesizers, cash and, of course, Aerobies.

But the push for the student market hasn't bothered Wham-o yet, Roddick asserts. While he wouldn't volunteer what Frisbee sales are, he added,

Frisbee jargon described

(CPS) -- Here's a glossary of Frisbee sports:

"Frisbee Golf":

Frisbee golf is a lot like regular golf, except a flying disk is used instead of a ball and clubs. "Courses" have been developed at campuses across the country, including the universities of Colorado, New Mexico, and Texas. But instead of greens and holes, students use what's available, aiming instead for lamp posts, trash cans, and flag poles.

"Ultimate Frisbee":

Ultimate frisbee is similar to soccer, but, of course, with a disk instead of a ball.

"Freestyle Frisbee":

This is the artistic side of Frisbee, in which contestants somehow manage to catch disks gracefully behind their backs, through their legs, over their heads while leaping. They are judged and awarded points according to their performance, much like competitive figure skating.

Interim targets area illiteracy

by Cindy Ashmore

A young mother from Anderson County did everything she could think of to help her sick child. Each day she rubbed ointment on the baby's chest and waited for the illness to improve. But the child only got worse; it even began having seizures. Finally, a friend of the family stopped in to check on the child. She looked at the ointment being used by the mother and found that it was mosquito repellant (from Knoxville News Sentinel, February 22, 1987).

The problems of illiteracy are sweeping our country. According to Harry Moskos, editor of the Knoxville News Sentinel, one out of every five adults in the United States is functionally illiterate. In other words, those adults cannot read or write well enough to enable them to perform efficiently on the job, at home, and in other ordinary settings.

To help fight the enormous problem, a group of MC students got together with Dr. Robert Bonham to participate in an interim that focused on illiteracy in Blount County. Under the direction of Carole Ergenbright, who heads the Blount County literacy program, the students took part in a week-long intensive training program to learn how to teach adults to read and write. Then, each MC student became certified as a tutor and was assigned his own adult reading student.

In the 13 weeks since the program began, MC tutors have experienced a great variety in the reading students with whom they have worked. Many of the adults are working to learn basic reading skills; others, however, are studying math, social studies, science, and other subjects that may help them in their everyday lives. Goals range from obtaining a GED and improving job skills to helping kids with homework and simply preventing accidents such as that of the young mother in Anderson County.

'Dry campus' is years' top issue

The academic year is at its end, with only final exams remaining. But it has been an eventful year on the MC campus.

The biggest issue has been the "dry campus" debate, which roused student ire and activism, prompted student-administration communication, and earned community publicity -- the MC controversy was featured in all area newspapers and on several local news broadcasts.

We oppose the "dry campus" policy, and applaud the decision by the board of directors to delay action on this question until next year, when, presumably, they will have had ample time to investigate the campus drinking problems, alternative solutions, and student attitudes.

Just as important as the policy itself is the way in which the controversy was handled on campus. For the most part, students showed maturity in their well-thought-out pros and cons, their willingness to work sensibly -- not rowdily -- toward a solution, and their eagerness to talk with President Ferrin and with board members.

The administration, also, particularly the board, has been admirably willing to try for a compromise to suit both sides. At the recent "protest" -- which was really a student-board communication session -- board members seemed eager to hear the students' opinions and ideas. This session also cleared up some of the fog caused by indirect student-board contact.

Although we oppose President Ferrin's viewpoint on this issue and the channels he followed, we grant that his job is a difficult and pressured one. We hope that over the next few months, he, as well as students and board members, explore all sides of this issue.

Obviously, not everyone will be pleased with the final decision. But whatever specific policies are finally instituted, we urge the campus community to accept or oppose them with the same maturity and willingness to talk.

Student blasts apartheid government in S. Africa

by Krista Ross-Mull

Racism to most Americans today, though not yet a thing of the past, is slowly but surely becoming extinct. Most of the people that I know are too young to remember the Jim Crow laws of the '50s and were still in diapers during the race riots of the '60s. Things have slowly gotten better for minorities in America since then, and it's only when things like the Howard Beach incident of New York happen that most people are reminded that we still have a long way to go in equality.

Unfortunately, though, there are some places in our world where extreme cases of racism happen every day. Not only that, but they are condoned and encouraged by the government.

The most notable case would have to be South Africa. As I read and learn more about the apartheid laws of South Africa, the more shocked I am that such a cruel, barbaric, and sub-human government could persist in our modern western culture. I want people to know what is going on in a country that our own government supports.

All South Africans are categorized into four races: white, coloured, Indian, and black. Every person must have his race marked on his birth certificate, driver's license, and work permit.

This is so that a light-skinned black or Coloured will not be able to pass for a white, for many parts of South Africa are for "whites only." In some white neighborhoods, the only way a non-white can enter the neighborhood is to be employed by a white and have a pass stating that he has permission to be in the neighborhood. In fact, most blacks have to carry a pass with them at all times. It provides proof that the black's presence in a specific area is legal or not. These passes must be produced on demand to the police and certain other officials.

Blatant segregation runs rampant in South Africa. There are many all ## insidious, student says Dorm rules are

by Rene Couto

Certain dorm rules are ridiculous. These rules are quiet hours, visitation hours, members of the opposite sex being in the rooms, and dorm parents. I feel that these rules are immature; they make me feel like a little kid. They also make it look like the students show lack of responsibility. Finally, I'm an adult, so I should be treated like one.

The quiet hours rule is absurd. I feel that I can adjust when to be quiet and when not to. I strongly believe that having quiet hours during the weekend is very wrong. The weekend is a time when I can release my stress from the classes during the week. There shouldn't be a rule called quiet hours; my own common sense knows when to be quiet.

Visitation hours are very stupid. This rule really makes me feel like a child. When someone comes to visit me, I don't want to go in the lobby where everyone else is, and I don't want to worry about how late or early it is, either. When someone comes to visit me, I feel it's a matter of privacy, so I'll take whomever to my room anytime I please.

Visitation hours should be 24 hours a day and visitors shouldn't need an escort. When the rules say the visitor needs an escort, that makes the student feel immature.

Members of the opposite sex should be allowed to go see whomever they want at whatever time. If I want a girl in my room at night, why should that bother someone else? People of the opposite sex should be allowed from Manpower, Inc.

Need a job? Get a job!

The nation's positive economic picture is creating an increasing number and variety of opportunities for summer job seekers, including college students and teachers.

"But even with the favorable odds, students and others looking for summer work will have to use some resourcefulness and initiative to make most of those opportunities," said Mitchell S. Fromstein, President and CEO of Manpower Inc.

Fromstein offered some tips for summer job seekers:

1. Be Persistent: Don't be discouraged if you haven't lined up a summer job yet. Many firms haven't completed their hiring.

2. Explore All Potential Job Sources: Newspaper ads are a good source of job leads, but not the only source. Ask relatives, teachers, and friends; call major firms and inquire about openings; contact temporary help service firms; check with local government job service offices.

3. Contact Your Former Employers: Firms like to bring back former workers who understand how their business operates, minimizing training requirements.

4. Understand Your Marketable Skills: Students often underestimate their skills. Consider your educational assets such as computer literacy, language, keyboard, research, and communication experience. And remember that students are accustomed to learning new skills quickly.

5. Look for Learning Opportunities: Present yourself as someone eager to learn; you may land a job where you can develop skills in word processing, computer operation, or general business practices.

6. Have Proper Legal Identification: This year, you must have a passport, Social Security card, or pictured driver's license to prove citizenship

St. Lawrence College orients with flair

(OCR) -- When it comes to getting students really involved in their school, St. Lawrence College -- St. Lawrence (Ontario) has often been in the forefront.

Students' involvement begins with an unusually creative freshman orientation. The theme changes each year, but one thing is sure: it's bound to be different.

Last fall's freshmen -- gathered for a day of speeches -- watched in shock as the college's principal was "shot" and "killed" during his welcome address. An inspector general (a Toronto actor in disguise) appeared on the scene to lead the murder investigation.

Teams of freshmen followed clues around the campus, meanwhile learning a lot about where different school services -- such as the library and financial aid office -- were located.

The teams gathered for lunch, and throughout the meal received additional clues from faculty members dressed as detectives. The teams then toured the city, all the while collecting more clues. At the end of the day, the teams gathered to report their findings. Several had detected the murderer and received prizes -- free tickets for a boat cruise.

Even though the murder mystery was a popular form of orientation, St. Lawrence will not repeat it. "We don't want anyone to become bored with orientation," said Doug Hone, counselor for the freshman-year experience.

Hone isn't worried about the students becoming bored so much as he's concerned about other staff members. The community college's orientation is run entirely by staff, who volunteer for the assignment. Though it's assigned to the student services office, "no one is in charge of orientation as part of a their job. It's all volunteer," said Hone. "That's why we have so much success."

The college has borrowed some orientation

How can MC food services improve?

by Matt Harrington

Dr. Sally Jacob's Inquiry class has conducted a survey of MC students on the food service issue. The results are in and as Richard Dalton would say, "Our survey says . . ."

Things liked best about the Maryville College food service are the following: all you can eat/drink, prompt service, fruit in the salad bar, and choice of cereal.

When students were asked if they were satisfied with Issac's, 108 answered yes and 38 answered no. When asked why they didn't like Issac's, the main answers were that faster service and more polite servers were needed. Other answers were that the food was too expensive, too greasy, and also that there was not enough variety.

Another question students were asked was what change would improve the atmosphere in the dining hall. The number one answer was louder music. This was followed by repainting, redecorating, and a change of arrangement in Pearson's.

Finally, students were asked what they would like to see added to the menu. Students replied that they would like to have a sundae bar, more seafood, watermelon, bagels, cheese sticks, croissants, chicken nuggets, corned beef, a low-calorie bar, boiled eggs, and meatless spaghetti sauce.

This year the food service contract is up for renewal. Therefore, copies of the survey will be sent to President Ferrin, Donna Davis, Leslie Nier, Andy Strickland, and the Food Service Committee to make them aware of the problems and strong points of Dobb's Food Service.

Apartheid, from p. 2

white neighborhoods in South Africa, and there are more being developed every day. This, of course, means displacing hundreds of Coloureds, Indians, and Blacks that happen to be living in one of the newly zoned white areas. Another example is a case in which a whole Coloured ward in a hospital was evacuated and the patients left to lie in the hall to make way for one white patient.

Punishment for blacks in South Africa is likely to be two, three, sometimes five times more severe than that of any white South African. For one example, in 1984 a sum total of 115 people were hanged for crimes; 89 were black, 24 were Coloured, one Indian, and two whites. Also, between July 1982 and June 1983, 24,292 blacks were whipped compared to the 1824 whites. Whipping is still a form of punishment in South Africa.

Since 1983, there has been a ban on all open-air gatherings of blacks, except for sports. A gathering was defined by law as a "public assembly of twelve or more people" in 1956, but in 1975 the definition was changed to "any number of people". The white South African government uses this as a pretense to arrest anyone that it may want to detain and question. In March 1985, the police arrested a total of 239 people while they were trying to have a march in protest against the shooting deaths of 19 people, on the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Sharpeville shootings, including several prominent anti-apartheid activists (the Sharpeville shooting was a riot in South Africa during the 60's in which 69 unarmed protesters were shot dead).

The marchers were fined and sentenced to six months in jail, though some are still being detained to this day.

These are just a few of the atrocities that the non-white South Africans have to live with. There is so much more, such as detention without trial (this includes all age groups, even eight- to ten-year-olds), poor health and welfare benefits, inadequate schooling, and low pay (in some cases blacks are paid as little as 17% of what whites are paid for the same job). South Africa, and apartheid are blots on our world, and I will not support any government that supports South Africa as it stands today. If we truly want this to be a free world, let's stop worrying about Russia and communism so much and take a look at what's going on in the rest of the world. Apartheid isn't a crime, it's an abomination.

FAC gallery: Dockery shows her true "Fibers"

by Jennifer Chastain

The last exhibit in the FAC Gallery this year is "Fibers" by senior art major Selena Dockery. Dockery's studio emphasizes textile design and weaving.

Her exhibit includes many examples of woven items including baskets, a variety of loom-woven scarves and belts, and a woven photograph. Dockery used both commercial and homemade dyes in her textile design to produce hand-dyed T-shirts, cloth, and yarn.

The T-shirts on display were made using both batik and tie-dye methods. Batik is a design method that uses hot wax to form the pattern and block the absorption of dyes in the area of the pattern.

Tie-dye uses rubber bands or string to block areas from dye. Dockery used tie-dyed cloth to make the cover of her guest book and for several other items in her show. The exhibit also features several large cotton pillows, a silk shirt and skirt outfit, a cotton tank top, a wind sock, and several scarves which were also made using the tie-dyed cloth.

A full-sized bed with a comforter and matching pillows and wall hangings, all made with silk-screened images, graces the back portion of the gallery.

Other processes on display include quilting, applique, and stenciling.

The exhibit was described by freshman art major Shannon Jackson as being "vibrantly exciting" and "showing a great range of talent."

When asked what process she enjoyed most, Dockery said that "exploring the possibilities in developing dye colors from various substances like proceon and vegetable dyes" was most rewarding.

Dockery summed up with a note that all seniors can appreciate: "I'm just glad it's over!"

Jennifer Chastain

Selena Dockery reclines on samples of her art work. This arrangement is part of her "Fibers" exhibit, now on display in the FAC.

You never forget the people who share your sailing expedition.

I thought sailing was all romance. The open sea, the slap of the sails, me looking tanned and athletic.

My Outward Bound vacation turned out to be romantic in a different way. I actually learned how to sail. I learned navigation and ecology. And I learned to live and work closely with 11 other people.

The 30-foot ketch we called home is descended from the whaling boats of the 1800s. We lived open to the elements, and to each other. No room for pettiness or anything less than enthusiasm. We discovered immediately that everything was simpler—and more rewarding—when we all worked together.

The big romance was discovery—or things I hadn't known I could do, or people who became friends as we learned to rely on each other. Outward Bound runs 500 courses for small groups of men and women, year-round, in sailing, backpacking, mountain climbing, rafting and canoeing.

to walk in the dorms at any time without worrying about getting written up by dorm parents or R.A.'s and S.A.'s.

It's my own business what I do, not the dorm parents' business; therefore, members of the opposite sex should be allowed to visit others at any time they please.

Having dorm parents is the most ridiculous part of dorm life I've ever known. I have my own parents telling me what to do and what not to do. Who are the dorm parents telling me how to do things or when not to bring people of the opposite sex over to visit me! It's none of their business what I do.

They should have no authority over me or other students. We already have R.A.'s and S.A.'s on each floor controlling things; I strongly believe having dorm parents in a dorm is far beyond ridiculous and they should never be permitted.

These certain dorm rules that I've pointed out should be banned from the student handbook. Having these rules makes me feel like a child in college. I'm an adult; therefore, I would appreciate it if I could be treated like one. All these rules cause total chaos for other students, not just myself.

I no longer feel like I live in a dorm, but I do feel like I'm living in a nursery school at twenty years of age.

Next fall, for example, the school is considering having teams of new freshmen walk on hot coals -- literally. "It's a motivational device," said Hone. Walking on coals is possible "if people believe it can be done," he said. "We believe it can raise students' self-esteem."

The MC tutors speak very favorably of their experiences with the literacy effort. One enthusiastic tutor, Lissa McLeod, said that tutoring is "one of the highlights of [her] week."

However, the MC participants realize that they could not do it alone. Bonham emphasizes the incredible efforts of Ergenbright and also gives credit to employer support from companies such as Cherokee Lumber, which pays its workers to seek help from the program. Last but certainly not least, the reading students themselves are the most important aspect of the program. Many of them have to work around tight schedules and overcome much fear of bringing out their disabilities.

One tutor, Kathy North, said of her student, "I have to give my student a lot of credit. He really has to work, and his wife is not supportive at all."

All in all, the MC interim has helped the Blount County literacy effort, but it has been little more than a drop in the bucket. The program needs the cooperation of many more people like the 16 MC students who participated in Bonham's interim.

The students who participated in the interim are Michelle Arp, Cindy Ashmore, Joanne Backe, Melissa Blough, Kate Braden, Andi Bristol, Cathy Cain, Barbara Covert, Heather Farrar, Michelle Grube, Alissa Hammond, Sherri Jones, Lissa McLeod, Kathy North, Cookie Payne, and David Yocom.

There are, he conceded, some problems with that other significant portion of the recreational disk market:

Dogs, Adler notes. "My guess is that Aerobies have not hurt Wham-o at all."

When prodded, however, Roddick conceded "the picnic player" -- the less-than-serious player who'll take a study break with anything that flies -- probably would buy only one of the toys.

"They go with the ebb and flow," Roddick said, "and buy whatever they saw Still, at least publically, Roddick said competition between the toys is "a non-issue. We wish them [Aerobie] well."

"We have friendly relations with Wham-o," added Adler. "I like to think that no one is mad at me."

Champion Zimmerman waxes poetic in his hopes for disk coexistence. "Playing catch is the oldest sport, except for running. Disks are a natural progression of evolution. It's beautiful to see them flying through the air. There's something special about that."

Lady Scots tennis team hosts tournament

by Lisa Harvey Linginfelter

The Lady Scots tennis team will close another winning season on May 5 and 6 by hosting the Women's Intercollegiate Athletic Conference (WIAC) tournament.

The MC netters are 7-5, with double wins over Milligan, Tusculum, and Tennessee Wesleyan, one over Berea, a loss each to Sewanee, Transylvania, and Tennessee Tech., and two losses to Centre. (At press time, they were hoping for revenge against Sewanee on May 4.)

The Maryville squad hopes for support from students, faculty, staff, and other fans on both days of the tournament, as the team will be facing tough competition and hopes to make a strong showing. Berea, Centre, Rhodes, and Sewanee will all bring competitive teams to the tournament.

Matches will begin at 9 a.m. on Friday, with play at John Sevier, Sandy Springs, and Springbrook Park courts. Headquarters will be at the John Sevier courts.

After a full day Friday, the action will continue Saturday, with the final and consolation rounds in singles beginning at 9 a.m. The doubles rounds are scheduled to begin at 11 p.m.

Coach David Cartlidge will be the official tournament director and referee, and a special thanks goes to Dwayne Sanders, Kandy Schram, and all others who have assisted with preparation.

Crowd disputes

by Jana Dalton

Republican Vice-presidential candidate Dan Quayle campaigned enthusiastically at Market Square in Knoxville on Monday, but much of his audience's attention was focused on a small group of very zealous Dukakis supporters.

The speech was primarily a series of political barbs, stressing the deficiencies of Dukakis' records and belief rather than focusing on the Republican platform.

As Quayle spoke, however, a group of Dukakis supporters, signs in hand, voiced their dissent and blew foghorns. When they attempted to raise a large handmade anti-Quayle banner, tempers flared. Quayle/Bush supporters surrounded the group and stood on their banner. They raised their own signs to cover up the Dukakis/Bentsen signs, and police escorted a few of the dissenters from the scene.

At one point, a heckler yelled, "Draft-Dodger!" at Quayle, to which he responded, addressing his supporters, "Don't worry, if you had to support Dukakis, you'd be yelling, too!"

The rally opened with red, white, and blue balloons bobbing in the morning air. Former White House Chief of Staff and native Tennessean Howard Baker introduced Quayle, who smiled and stepped onto the podium, with a huge American flag as backdrop.

Quayle commented that while he "was visiting the [Knoxville] Candy Factory, Dukakis was visiting the Castor Oil Factory."

Other dignitaries attending the rally were Knoxville Mayor Victor Ashe and Republican Congressional candidate Jimmy Duncan, Jr.

Conference to promote student vote in '88

Over 500 student government presidents, campus newspaper editors, and state student associations, representing all 50 states and the District of Columbia, have issued a call to convene a National Student Conference on Voter Participation.

Voter registration: It's not painful

by Chris Varner

Very few people actually enjoy registering to vote. In fact, some might put it right up there with peeling dead skin off of their toes. The process of registering to vote, however, is not as dangerous or as painful as it seems.

If you're 18 years old and haven't committed any felonies, (crimes so serious that your allowance was suspended temporarily), mosey on down to the basement of the Blount County Courthouse (on Court Street) sometime between 8:00 a.m. and 4:00 p.m., Monday through Friday.

The Blount County Election Commission is also open from 9:00 a.m. to 1:00 p.m. on the three Saturdays before the October 8 registration deadline: September 24, October 1, and October 8.

What do you do once you're there? It's relatively painless.

You're eligible to register if you've lived in Tennessee for 20 days or more. If you're not registered, all you have to do is fill out a little information slip.

If you are registered in another state or district, bring your card with you, and the registration will be changed to Blount County. If you have any questions, the Election Commission's phone number is 983-0401.

Well, that was quick and easy. The entire process only took about five minutes. Now comes the hard part -- deciding whom to vote for.

The conference, to be held in Washington, D.C., from September 30 to October 2, will focus on the importance of youth voter registration, education, and get-out-the-vote efforts nationwide.

The 1988 Conference is modeled on the highly successful 1984 National Student Conference on Voter Registration, which attracted 1,500 participants. It was the largest student gathering of its kind since the Vietnam War. The 1984 conference, held at Harvard University, resulted in the registration of over 500,000 new voters and helped to make 1984 the first year that voter participation among 18- to 24-year-olds increased since 1972.

"With a close election at hand, this conference will be the most significant youth-oriented political event of the campaign season," Catherine Crane, director of the National Student Campaign for Voter Registration, asserted. "We plan to put students and student issues back on the national political agenda in 1988."

Not everyone at the Quayle rally on Monday was a GOP supporter. Is it open season on "Quayle" in Tennessee?

Highland Echo Look to the sky

Amid the news of a White House astrologer and last year's "harmonic convergence," People tend to confuse astrology with astronomy. We often forget that astronomy is a valid -- and valuable -- science.

Space exploration is a necessary next step in our technological, scientific, and even cultural development. The Planetary Society, along with other groups, is trying to convince a skeptical nation of the value of space exploration, especially the potential of our solar system. The Society's "Mars Declaration," a petition that endorses "the goal of human exploration of Mars," urges nations throughout the world to take "initial steps" toward this goal.

The Society is also sponsoring "Mars Watch," marking yesterday's "favorable opposition" of Mars and Earth. The two planets were at their closest point in 17 years, a phenomenon that will not reappear until 2003.

We urge the MC community to take this occasion to give special consideration to support of the space program. Space exploration is a romantic notion, but it also can yield tangible solutions to problems planetside.

This issue is not politically fashionable, but don't ignore it. As Earth and Mars passed nearby (at least by astronomical standards), please resolve to support attempts to link these planets still more closely by man-made ties.

Editor's notes:

As a new academic year opens, it's time for reevaluations and reviews campuswide. It is also time to restate the Echo's central policy.

The Echo aims at providing information that will interest or that will be of importance to the campus community. However, since we publish only bimonthly, we cannot adequately keep up with "straight" news. This information usually reaches you via campus bulletins.

Therefore, we prefer a "feature-oriented" approach, meaning that we present stories with a less timely appeal, to avoid printing material that has become dated by our production schedule.

We also strongly encourage input from students, faculty, and staff. We love getting letters to the editor, be they comment on some issue, response to an article or column, or criticism of some facet of the campus (the Echo included). This input heartens us, by proving that someone actually reads the Echo, and it serves you, by providing a forum for your opinions and suggestions.

To drop out or not to drop out: 13 reasons to consider

by Becky Hill

1. America needs more college drop-outs. College drop-outs ensure that society's dirty work will be done -- dirty, dangerous, temporary, dead-end, and underpaid jobs that so many businesses depend on for their existence.

2. Because the poor will work for low wages, they subsidize the activities that make the affluent happy. For example, domestics subsidize the affluent by freeing the woman of the house to participate in the civic, sports, and political activities that are so important to them.

3. America needs the low-paid American to buy the goods others do not want. Day-old bread and fruits, vegetables, that would otherwise be thrown out. Just think of the second-hand clothes, used rattle-trap cars, and deteriorating, slum buildings. What would America do with all their junk if it were not for the uneducated and the poor?

4. Uncle Sam needs YOU! The peacetime army recruits its infantrymen mainly from among the poorly educated.

Throughout history the wars have been fought by the finest and healthiest young men that the country has to offer. The front-line troops have consisted of the poorest of the poor.

5. The poor and powerless help facilitate and stabilize the American political process. Because they do not vote and do not participate in the political process, the political system is free to ignore and forget them.

6. Although there is some evidence that the poor are about as law-abiding as anyone else, they are more likely than middle-class transgressors to be caught and punished when they participate in deviant acts.

Moreover, they lack the money to hire a respectable lawyer when they are innocent when they are falsely accused, therefore they are more likely to serve time for a crime they did not commit.

Readmits adjust to college reentry, enrich MC

by Jana Dalton

College, for most, represents a rung on the ladder of life, chronologically following high school and preceding the hoped-for career.

But sometimes chronological schedules are interrupted and a new education begins.

A handful of readmits attend MC. The majority of our stories ring familiar. Some difficulty or decision prompted our exit from MC or from college altogether. We went in diverse directions until we realized -- either from a dead-end job or an unsatisfied goal -- the need of an education.

I asked a couple of new "old" students, "Why MC again?" and found their responses parallel to mine: "Small, quiet school"; "loved the area"; "wanted the individual attention."

We agreed that MC has changed. The students and faculty seem more enthusiastic. We appreciate the cosmetic improvements of Crawford House and the Library. We think the new faces in administration will help the school to prosper. And we are adjusting to the changes in federal funding and the potential "dry" campus policy.

The most interesting discoveries our involved activities since we left MC. Mark Koerber, a junior, tried UT for a few years. Later he entered the work force. He devoted his energies during this time to his writings -- a novel and poetry.

Student decries registration wait

by Andi Bristol

Yet another glorious year of academia has begun at MC. Students' first challenge in this 170th year of the MC tradition was that all too nerve-racking experience of registration.

Registration. The very word ties my stomach in knots. The never-ending lines. The never-ending hassles at the end of each and every line.

This semester's registration process was greatly improved by having the freshmen register separately from the upperclassmen. This process, however, did not alleviate all of the problems.

Jennifer Worth and I arrived at the gym at 9:30 a.m. on September 7. I was ahead of her in the Registrar's line and then proceeded smoothly through the Financial Aid line. Then came the Business Office line. "Bristol" begins with a "B," therefore I entered the eternal

Ferrin hails MC 'Renaissance'

At 6:00 a.m. last Friday morning, I watched and listened as the Concert Choir stood on the steps of Pearsons Hall and sang the beautiful Lutkin Benediction, a traditional treasure at Maryville.

Goose bumps broke out as I participated in this memorable moment of choir initiation, listened to our 41-member choir, and learned some of the choir's plans for the year. The choir's size, which has doubled since last year, struck me as another sign of the "Maryville Renaissance."

I was delighted to note the enthusiasm of so many new freshmen students and transfers and grateful to observe the leadership of dedicated upperclass men and women. It is a beautiful combination, and one that is showing up across the campus

-- in classrooms, in athletics, in the theatre, among the Echo staff, and in social gatherings -- it is truly a wonderful time to be at Maryville.

In our determination to provide the finest education possible, we have stepped up our fund-raising efforts. While these efforts include all aspects of the Maryville program, from scholarships to campus beautification, to athletics, our special focus is on the academic program. We need to update equipment, improve facilities, and fill the gaps in our faculty.

Success in these efforts will enable us to make significant progress in our commitment to educational quality, and I look forward to making announcements throughout the year as we secure the needed funds.

This year is off to a fine start, and I trust that the enthusiasm and dedication I have seen from students, faculty, and staff will combine with the requisite hard work and imagination by all of us to produce a year filled with growth, stimulation, and joy. Blessings to you all.

Theissen directs MC band, conducts MACCO

by Bill Householder

"New" is the operative word for this year, for not only do we have an increased number of new freshmen, but we received a number of new faculty. One of the new faculty members is Paul Theissen, MC's new band and MACCO director.

Before coming to MC, Theissen was General Music Director and Chief Conductor from 1981-88 at Landestheater in Coburg, West Germany. He conducted many operas and symphonies, including the whole Wagner opera Thaenhauser, which was recorded with the Bodensee Symphony Orchestra.

Theissen has had much experience with conducting and music in general over the past 20 years or so, including being an opera coach in Dusseldorf and Mainz, teaching at the Robert Schumann conservatory in Dusseldorf, performing Porgy and Bess for the first time in German in Mainz, and adapting three musicals for radio as well as being the leader of the Berner Big Band while in Bern.

One might wonder why a man with all Theissen's experience would want to come to a small college in East Tennessee instead of some bigger music schools and universities in New York or Vienna. There are two reasons.

"After 28 years experience in...opera houses and big orchestras, I like to [work in a] small college like Maryville...work with students," said Theissen. He said he doesn't like big colleges and universities, and that at a smaller college there is more contact between students and faculty.

Theissen believes that if there is a greater chance of problems being solved, then there is a greater chance of understanding being developed.

He also has connections with Maryville, most notably his wife -- opera singer, alumna, and now instructor for MC, Margaret Mann -- as well as friends he's made while vacationing in America. He also said that this area reminds him of his Bavarian homeland.

On coming back to Maryville with a husband of German descent, Mann says there was no problem for Theissen to become a part of Maryville College: "...as far as his ideas and his musical background, he's better developed and ready to take on responsibilities, where

8. The lower-paid individual provides incomes for doctors, lawyers, teachers, and others who are too old, poorly trained, and incompetent to attract more affluent and wiser clients.

9. The struggling class serve a direct cultural function. They have become cultural heroes. Where would America be today without the cowboy, the hobo, the bum, and the prostitute? Who would our children dress up like on Halloween?

10. The charity ball and the uneducated have a very special function at the holidays. The civic organizations are able to distribute turkeys and hams to the needy while receiving a warm and wonderful feeling of usefulness. Indeed, the busy socialites need the poor to give assistance to at Christmas and Thanksgiving.

11. Thank goodness for the poor! During the 19th century, they did the backbreaking work that built the cities; today they are being pushed out of their neighborhoods to make room for progress. No other group would allow itself to be uprooted and displaced. Expressways, universities, hospitals, and civic centers are being built; other groups would have to be fairly compensated. America should be grateful for its poor.

Efforts succeed; '88 - '89 enrollment increases

by Lynn Smith

Where did all of these new faces come from? A lot of upperclassmen may have asked this question at the beginning of the school year.

It is not such a ridiculous question, since, according to Registrar Martha Hess, last year at this time there were 136 freshman and 37 transfers, compared to 227 freshman and 56 transfers this year.

The total enrollment of day students this year is 615, whereas there were 487 enrolled last year.

When asked what attributed to the enrollment increase, Carl A. Pagles, dean of Admissions and Enrollment Management, said "It was a combination of activities. I know the Admissions staff worked very hard last year, along with help from the faculty, Student Foundation members, and the rest of the college community to increase the enrollment."

Pagles also commented that a modified financial package helped to attract more students this year.

He said that 20 percent of the new students come from Blount County, and a large number from other areas in Tennessee, Florida and Georgia. "There's not really a change in the students' demographics; there are just more of them," said Pagles.

Because of this increased enrollment, various departments have had to add new faculty members, enlarge classes and, add new sections.

This is especially true in the department of Languages and Literature. Arthur Bushing, chairman of the department, commented that he gave about 100 more placement tests to new students than last year.

There are seven new professors in this department and a few of them have more on their shoulders than expected. According to Bushing, David Powell had originally intended to teach one or two courses; he now has four courses.

Both Bushing and Charlotte Beck, professor of English, have full loads this semester. Sections of English 104 have been added to make classes smaller; likewise, sections of French 110 were added.

Bushing further notes that Maryville College has not only increased the quantity of students, but the quality of students as well. He said, "Average scores on the placement tests given this summer were higher than those in the past."

Pagles said that he does not expect the growth to stop this year. He believes more students create more excitement on campus: "This allows enthusiasm to flow over into other activities like drama, choir, and the newspaper staff."

He does not want the campus to grow so fast that the college loses its personal touch and students become dissatisfied with their experiences on campus.

There have been discussions, according to Pagles, for new housing options, growth among faculty and classroom enrollment increases in the future.

the very least, twice as long as the "M-Z" line. You would think that after the first couple of times this infuriating imbalance occurred, it would have been changed to make students' lives a little easier.

How long does it take to look at an alphabetical list of students and decide where the middle is -- I guarantee you it is not at "M".

I realize that registration at MC is nothing compared to what UT students undergo, but there are tens of thousands of them and 600 of us.

back. It is a great challenge to enter college again; for many of us it's been years since we left.

We are trying to overcome the age differences, the change in social scenes, and the lack of study habits. And regardless of what they tell you, it's not as easy as riding a bicycle.

But we are here -- a proud few -- hopefully to the finish this time. This time we begin with a different perspective, because we don't question just what MC can give to us -- but what we have to offer to MC.

other people would probably have to think 'Oh, is this too much for me?' or 'Can I handle this?' I was never nervous about that, and because he had had been with me every summer here... and since we had spent our honeymoon here in the mountains, as far as the environment, he knew Maryville."

As for music, Theissen does not believe in being a specialist in one particular field of music. He said, "It's too narrow...and today, in our century you have to be wider in [your] thinking about music."

He said that he wants to do more with the band for the community. Theissen and Mann are putting together a summer music program in cooperation with the Knoxville Symphony Orchestra. The program will be an annual festival with college and pre-college students to study music, drama, and dance.

Of Theissen, Dr. James Bloy, director of the MC music department, said "...he will inspire the instrumental players to do their best and because they're doing their best, they'll enjoy what they do."

Bradley casts Czech comedy

by Jennifer C. Worth

"Ra ko hutu
... kendy, alyv zvyde de dezu ..."

So opens The Memorandum by Vaclav Havel, MC Theatre's fall production. It is not some archaic language or monstrous typo, but an office memo written in "Ptydepe," a language designed solely to maximize the efficiency of office memos.

Ptydepe and the office wide entanglements caused by its enforced use are the focus of the play, which Theatre Director Frank Bradley describes as "a bureaucratic farce." The Memorandum "attacks and exposes the extent to which we are subjected to systems which control us, often without our knowledge," Bradley said.

Bureaucracy is one such system. Bradley also plans to deal with another such system -- pop culture, especially television. The play's action hinges around language; Bradley noted, "Language itself forms a system which in a sense controls our thoughts."

The Memorandum was written in 1965, and it first appeared in the U.S. in a 1967 Joseph Papp production

It won the 1967-68 Obie Award for Best Foreign Play. It is, Bradley said, "probably his [Havel's] best-known and most-performed play in the West."

Havel, a Czech, aimed his satire at "the Eastern European, particularly Soviet, penchant for bureaucratic entanglement," Bradley said, noting that the Russian bureaucratic infamy predates Marxist-Leninism. A forerunner of The Memorandum is Nicolai Gogol's 18th-century play The Inspector General.

The play's Eastern European origin creates special challenges for an American production. Bradley plans to remove the play from its 1960's Eastern-bloc context and fit it into 1988 America.

MC's production will further Americanize Vera Blackwell's translation of the script, including changing the original names to versions that will be more familiar to an American audience. Bradley's emphasis on pop culture and fashion, in addition to bureaucracy, will further Americanize the play.

Find the magic in dusty Bagdad

by Jennifer C. Worth

Bagdad (sic), California is a small, desert town. In fact, it's not so much a town as a place to park tractor trailer trucks alongside the road. This unlikely spot is the setting for the new comedy, Bagdad Cafe.

Bagdad's leading citizen is Brenda, proprietress of the Bagdad Hotel and the Bagdad Cafe. She has the questionable help of a shiftless husband, a cook who keeps a hammock behind the bar, and a son who continually plays the piano instead of pumping gas. Further complicating Brenda's life are her motherless infant grandson and her flighty, teenage daughter.

Amidst the tribulations of a broken coffee machine and her husband's angry departure, Brenda nears the breaking point. Enter Jasmin, a stereotypical Bavarian matron who is completely alien in dusty world. And with Jasmin comes the magic.

Jasmin brings magic both figuratively, with her genuinely sympathetic nature, and literally, with the magic kit from her husband's luggage.

Jasmin's intergration into the Bagdad cafe's of misfits is rocky for her but hilarious for the audience. She teaches Brenda's daughter about lederhosen and Bavarian folk dancing. She listens, enraptured, to the cafe's piano under Brenda's son's skilled hands -- he plays Bach, of course. And using sleight of hand to produce condiments from thin air, she serves the cafe's scanty clientele. But that clientele grows.

Under Jasmin's influence, the dingy cafe gleams and magic shows become routine. Soon truckers all over the area

Temptation asks, 'Who was Jesus?' amid protests

by Missy Pankake

According to the Gospels, Jesus once asked "Who do men say I am?"

The movie The Last Temptation of Christ is the portrayal of two men's personal opinions of who Jesus of Nazareth really was.

The first man is the author of the novel on which the movie is based, Nikos Kazantzakis, Nobel prize winning author. Kazantzakis' religious background is the Greek Orthodox Church. The prevalent theme in most of his novels reflects the conflict of choosing between the flesh and the spirit. This is also an issue the Greek Orthodox Church as well as other Christian religions, struggle with.

Dr. David Cartlidge, MC's chairman of the department of religion and philosophy, has used the novel in his classes for required reading. He said, "I consider it to be a 'must-read' for 20th-century literature. I recommend the novel highly."

The novel would have remained in the classroom if it weren't for the second man, director Martin Scorsese. Scorsese decided to do the movie because he was fascinated by Kazantzakis' opinion "that the human part of Jesus would have trouble accepting the Divine."

John Leo of Time said that the movie has been "a quest by one of Hollywood's most esteemed directors to bring to the screen a struggling Christ who only slowly comes to see himself as the Messiah."

The quest has had its problems from the beginning. In 1983, Paramount Pictures pulled out just weeks before filming started. After three years, Scorsese finally got backing from Universal Pictures.

Once filming got underway in Morocco, protestors, bomb threats, and death threats to people involved in the production became constant problems.

The movie starts with a disclaimer that the movie is based on Kazantzakis' novel, not the Gospels. It shows Jesus as a troubled and unaccepting Messiah. In the film, Jesus states, "I want Him [God] to hate me."

He reluctantly accepts His fate, and even arranges His own crucifixion with the help of Judas, His best friend. While He is on the cross, an angel comes to Him, and His vision of temptation begins.

In His vision, Jesus marries Mary Magdalene, the prostitute, and they have several children. She dies, and He becomes the lover of the sisters Mary and Martha and fathers more children. His apostles turn against Him and call Him "traitor."

As He nears His death from old age, Jesus realizes that He has failed mankind. He sees that the life He has been living is not real; it's a vision from Satan. He wakes up on the cross and dies.

Many people feel that the movie should have flopped. John Simon of The National Review wrote, "It is too bad that various religious groups have seen fit to persecute it and thereby provide invaluable free publicity to a movie that could have died promptly of its own boring ineptitude."

Simon goes on to point out such flaws as the bad grammar found in various scenes, the unrealistic use of various accents from the clipped British voice to the nasal New Yorker, scenery that was unbelievable, and the fact that no Hebrew customs were used.

However, most people are not concerned with the movie's quality, but rather with its content. Many protesters have vehemently

MC sports teams gear up for strong seasons

by Matt Wayland

Fall is in the air! And so are soccer, tennis, and volley balls as a new athletic season takes off at Maryville College.

The addition of several new coaches and many new students means a brighter outlook for many teams. Most of the teams are young but possess a lot of talent and energy. The schedules for many teams are tougher this year, but the players feel up to it.

A new varsity sport this year is women's soccer. Led by ex-Farragut High School coach Jerry Litton, this young team of nine freshmen, three sophomores, and five seniors are already off to a promising start. They tied UT, 1-1, and are expecting to win a rematch against the Vols this season.

The schedule is not an easy one, with the toughest matches slated against Erskine College, UNC-Greensboro, and Sewanee. As Litton said, "We'll take our licks" but will give them out as well.

Another team with high hopes this year is the women's tennis team. After a successful season last year, Dr. David Cartledge and his netters are ready for more.

They have already defeated Cumberland College, 8-1, but they lost number three seed Andrea Dye for the season with a fractured wrist.

Cartledge said that the schedule is tougher this year but that the team is "as strong as last year's" with returning players Raina Boring, Becky Shackelford, Lynn Burgin, Ann Beaty, and Eileen Freund.

Another MC team on the rise is the women's volleyball team. They have a 3-2 record so far this season. Coach Kandi Schramm was recently named to the Regional Board of the National Level of NCAA Volleyball Coaches and was honored as one of the Outstanding Women in America; Schramm said that her team has "a lot of talent and youth."

The team consists of six freshmen, one sophomore, and two juniors.

Schramm also felt that "our conference is stronger this year with a lot of teams even with one another."

The team's toughest opponents should be Milligan and King Colleges, but according to Karen Palka, "We will beat them!"

After turning the women's basketball program around last year, Coach Wes

0-2 Scots have hope for season

by Lori Chambers

A new season has come for the Maryville College football team, and despite losses in their first two games, the team has maintained a very good attitude, according to Head Coach Phil Wilks.

Wilks feels that the team gets better every time they go out on the field, and he says that he is very pleased with the type of young men he has. Players and coaches have made a commitment to work for improvements, Wilks says, and the seniors on the team have worked especially hard to make the talented but inexperienced freshman players feel a part of the team.

Scots seniors are Russ Thomas, starting quarterback; Jeff Reichert, starting defensive end; Chris Kaijser, starting defensive tackle; and Hank Snyder, starting defensive end.

Sports Commentary: Alum: Falling in love with falling

It should come as no surprise to anyone that football players are a special breed. Who else finds satisfaction in chasing after someone, slamming into him to make a tackle, and falling to the ground?

It takes a hard head to make a person want this brand of abuse and a hard body to endure it -- unless you know the secret. I call it the "Marble Technique."

While most players do their darnedest to stay on their feet, there's always a good chance that he will land on his face, due to either his own actions or those of a 237-pounder on the other side of the ball. In America this is considered fun, and millions of spectators pay their hard-earned money each year to watch teams abuse each other in this peculiar fashion.

Early on, I learned that the survivors in this unusual sport were the ones who could avoid injury. I intended to be one of them.

This mission was aided by the fortuna's circumstances of my personality. I enjoyed showing off. What better way to attract attention than to fall down? I'd fall for anyone who would watch.

Falling took on great importance in my life, which gives you a clue about some of the intellectual priorities of a youngster. (I don't think things have changed much; we just didn't have skateboards for our suicide missions. But I digress.)

By simply relaxing during the fall, I learned, I was landing on more body surface and falling more parallel to the ground.

Babies and drunks know the technique well, although you probably couldn't get many to talk about it.

I began to practice falls from loftier heights. By keeping my head turned to the side, I was able to avoid the unpleasant sensation that accompanies a broken nose.

This movie is probably the year's most innovative comedy. The director is creative, the script is well-crafted, and the approach is fresh. The characters are, without exception, interesting and well-drawn portrayals by a fine cast consisting mainly of unfamiliar faces (except for Jack Palance in an atypical role as a romantic artist).

Bagdad Cafe's only significant flaw is the ending, which in its attempt to tie up all loose ends carries matters too far. A simpler, more concise conclusion would have served the film better.

This movie opens in Knoxville this weekend: make an effort to see it. You won't soon forget these characters, this movie, or its haunting theme song, "I'm Calling You" by Jevetta Steele.

Starting on defense for the Scots are Mark Humphries at tackle, Jess Massengill at nose guard, Tom Tonzau at linebacker, David Hunnicutt at linebacker, John Speights at strong safety, Ryan Shelton at corner, Rocky Casteel at safety, and Leroy Owens at corner.

The Scots lost to Rhodes on September 10 at home and to Centre on September 17 in Danville, Kentucky.

They will face Cumberland on October 1 in Williamsburg, Kentucky. The Homecoming football game will be against Hampden-Sydney on October 22.

Protests from p.6

displayed their disapproval of this interpretation of Jesus. One of the biggest controversial scenes is the bedroom scene between Jesus and Mary Magdalene. Many Christians are not prepared to deal with something that portrays Jesus as a sexual being.

One man, Bill Bright of Campus Crusade, was so upset by the movie that he offered Universal $10 million to destroy all copies of the film before it was shown. Universal replied that First Amendment rights were not for sale, and even released the movie six weeks ahead of schedule. Outraged protestors went into action.

Moviegoers hoping to see this film can expect to cross picket lines. They can also expect to clear the theatre at least once for a bomb threat.

Less volatile protestors are carrying out a boycott of MCA companies' products, including Universal Pictures, Grosset and Dunlop publishers, Spencer Gifts and Motown Records.

Falling from p.7

By keeping my arms relaxed and my palms down in front of me, I looked a little like a grasshopper as I fell, but that was irrelevant.

One day a spectator made the astute observation that I was "missing a few marbles." Despite my embarrassment with the nickname "marbles," which stuck for awhile, my falling technique worked, and I went to taller heights.

My goal was to fall from the height of a goalpost crossbar. I exceeded even that, however, when I succumbed to the tantalizing lure of a carnival equipment trailer. Was its roof eight feet high? I don't recall. Maybe it was more. But fall from it I did, and I did it without injury.

In Maryville, the film will most likely never be available. Foothills Cinema is associated with Consolidated Theatres, and Consolidated Theatres has decided not to show the movie at any of its theatres.

Karen Lawson, the manager of Foothills Cinema said that even if Consolidated Theatres was showing it, she wouldn't show it in Maryville. She has received many petitions from area churches and realizes that "every church group would've been right here at my doorstep."

The movie is not necessarily theologically incorrect. Leo wrote in Time, "As both fully human and fully divine, Jesus is viewed in Christian theology as free of sin, but subject to all temptations, including sexual ones."

Dr. Glen Hewitt, new professor of religion at MC, agrees that "according to classic theology, Jesus was completely human and completely divine." Hewitt also said, "Although we may disagree with Scorsese's conclusions, raising the issue teach this technique and individuals wishing to learn it on their should follow these suggestions:

*Practice falls first on a soft mattress, then on a wrestling mat.

*Always land on the palms of the hands and on as much body surface as possible.

*Stay relaxed, and practice saying "relax" to yourself.

*Open-field runners knowing and using the "Marble Technique" should keep their eyes fixed on the goal line rather than on the tacklers.

It is my hope you younger football players will relax and roll with life's punches, unharmed and unbruised.

Completing the cast are Bill Householder as Pillar, Kipp Martines as George, Marshall Isbell as Thurb, and Mark Roddy as Mr. Column.

Chris Millsaps, Trish Lunsford, Kim Hardin, and David Kirby will play Clerks; Dan Fox, Tom Anderson, Jennifer Danner, Tammy Robertson, Wes Milstead, and Michelle Rudisill are the Maintenance Crew.

Performances of The Memorandum will be November 17-20.

of Jesus' humanity is a good thing."

Many people at Maryville College, while not really defending the movie, expressed their annoyance with the protestors.

Cartledge remarked, "It must've been a slow year newswise." He added that the protesting is "too bad. People should be allowed to see for themselves."

Rae Ann Hickman, a junior, wrote a letter to The Knoxville News-Sentinel that asked, "Instead of expending so much energy and time opposing this relatively harmless film, why don't the concerned citizens (Christian and not) attack just as vehemently much more dangerous and damaging evils to the American society?"

Although many people at MC would like to see The Last Temptation of Christ for themselves, they won't be able to because of problems caused national and local protests. They will just have to wait and see if Scorsese's and Kazantzakis' answer to Jesus' question, "Who do men say I am?" comes out on video.

Sports from p.7

Moore has a challenging season ahead of him. They will be facing a tougher schedule this year and will be "stepping into the fire," according to Moore, by opening the season at Mary Mount University on November 18. He feels that the team has "more talent this year" and "more depth" than the 15-12 team of last season.

Moore also said that he has "a young team," and that they "may take time to get used to the college level."

The men's basketball team is looking very strong this year as well. Head Coach Randy Lambert and Athletics Director who led the Scots to a school record 19 wins last year, said "Seven of my top 10 players are back," and "four new players will add depth."

This is the first season that the Scots will be an independent (not a member of an existing organized league); however, they will open the season with a tournament at former ODA opponent Emory and Henry on November 18.

Coach Lambert is "very pleased with the direction the whole program is heading," and his goal is to be "competitive in all athletic teams."

An example of this potential is the men's soccer team, which "should be knocking on the door of an NCAA playoff berth," according to Lambert.

Tempers flare at Bush rally

by Andi Bristol

Republicans who joined together, September 26, at the Greenbelt to promote George Bush's presidential campaign were surprised when protestors interrupted their gathering. Among the local Republicans to speak were State Senator Carl Kocila and Lynn Duncan, wife of Congressional hopeful Jimmy Duncan, who was unable to attend.

Koella addressed the group, asking them to vote a straight Republican ticket. Of the Democrats, he said, "This is a time for politics. This is a time for hard knocks."

Koella's speech then turned to Michael Dukakis' membership in the Civil Liberties Union: "I challenge you to find out what Dukakis' club that he's a card-carrying member of is up to and where it's taking this country."

Meanwhile, the protestors quietly marched, carrying their signs, which noted Reagan-Bush ties to Noriega and the Central American drug trade. One sign read, "Reagan and Bush: A 'Crack' Team."

Dr. Harry Howard, associate professor of political science and chairperson of the Social Sciences division at MC, who was there as a supporter of the Republican party, said of the protestors' presence, "I don't think that it is hurting the rally. I think that, if anything, it is making the folks here more unified."

Koella was obviously troubled by their presence. He accosted several of the protestors, telling them that they had no right to be there.

But according to Donnie Douglas of the Maryville Police Department, "As long as they are just walking around and not causing any trouble they have the right to do that."

When Koella was asked for an official

Programming slates fall activities

by Lynn Smith

"Let's all work together and do things right. I want to reach out to the students and give them what they want," said the new head of Student Programming, Sherrie O'Brien.

Among the major activities planned this year are movie nights, dances, a hayride, campus-wide Lazer Tag, and a Vin, Lose, or Draw tournament. Student Programming has also been working on special events that will take place during the Christmas season.

According to O'Brien, Student Programming's goal is to have three dances a month so students will have something to do on campus during the weekends. The dances are not just going to be held by Student Programming but will also be in cooperation with other organizations.

The college's sound system can provide music for the dances. If students can recommend bands to O'Brien, she will try to get them scheduled. "The more music on campus, the better," O'Brien said.

A special music event is going to take place October 9, when about 200 alumni will gather on campus to perform as the alumni choir. This is one way O'Brien wants to meet her objective to bring back old traditions and see the current students start new traditions.

A hayride is scheduled for October 15. The ride will leave for Cades Cove at 7:00 p.m., and there will be activities for students once they arrive.

O'Brien saw that a lot of students were playing Lazer Tag on campus, so a campus-wide Lazer Tag game was planned for October 6.

Student Senate plans election-year events, names cabinet at meeting

by Lissa McLeod

The Student Senate held its first meeting on September 29 at 12:30 p.m. in the CCM. Topics of business included election and nomination of personnel and discussion of upcoming events related to the presidential election.

The All-College Council (ACC) is a body of faculty, staff, and students co-chaired by President Richard Ferrin and Student Senate President Jon Allison. Selections for the ACC were Chris Varner (freshman), Lynn Burgin (sophomore), Kevin Lynch (junior), Jennifer Greenwalt (senior), and Sabine Hutchinson (member-at-large). These senators will serve as representatives for the student body in the ACC decisions.

A vice-president for Student Senate was selected.

Duties for the vice-president, Jennifer Greenwalt, will include taking over for the president if he steps down or is removed from office, is unable to be present at meetings, or desires to step out of position and speak on the floor of the senate.

Allison presented his selection for the two cabinet positions of secretary and parliamentarian. His nomination for treasurer will be forthcoming.

Chosen for secretary is Kristi Self. Self is a senior and a veteran student senator who has displayed leadership to the senate in the past. Parliamentarian is Floyd Dingman. Dingman's experience with model United Nations delegations gives him experience for the position, Allison feels.

Events discussed for the month of October include a voter registration drive and a viewing and discussion of the second presidential candidate's debate.

The voter registration drive, done in conjunction with the Peace Education Task Force, was held from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. outside Fayerweather Hall on October 3-5. Also planned are evening assaults on the dorms in an attempt to get students quickly and painlessly registered to vote on November 8, 1988.

In an effort to make students aware of the presidential race, the Student Senate is also planning a viewing of the second presidential candidate debate on either October 13 or 14 and a panel discussion following. Various members of the faculty are being asked to serve on this panel.

Right to protest misunderstood

"Protest... a formal declaration of disapproval." It sounds tame enough. Why, then, does the word generate such powerful emotions?

The term commonly means not only a "formal declaration of disapproval," but a vocal and even physical one as well. It evokes bad memories of 60's campuses or worse images of evening news scenes, complete with riot gear and tear gas.

But "protest" and "riot" are not interchangeable terms, although the former occasionally degenerates into the latter. In fact, protesting, in an organized, non-violent manner, is protected by our First Amendment right to assembly.

Protesting has been a big national and local issue over the past few months, with the publicity given to fundamentalists opposing the release of The Last Temptation of Christ. Knoxville's Westown Theater got a heaping dose of protesting and of rioting, the uglier, younger sibling of protesting (see related story).

Even closer to home, a group of MC students protested the policies of the Reagan-Bush administration at a "Bush for President Rally" in Maryville's Greenbelt Park on September 26. Political ideologies were also the issue for a group of Dukakis supporters who protested at Republican vice-presidential candidate Dan Quayle's speech in Knoxville on September 19.

In all of the cases, the protests got out of hand, due to the protestors, those protested against, or both.

At the Quayle rally, the protestors displayed immaturity by such acts as blowing foghorns during his speech. Their right to express their political disapproval of Quayle did not cancel out his right to speak. (He, however, failed to capitalize on this right by reciting political barbs instead of focusing on valid political issues.)

Another group of protestors stirred more aggressive reactions among their listeners than did the anti-Quayle supporters. The MC students and faculty, including Dr. Elizabeth Perez-Reilly and several members of the Peace Education Task Force, protested the Republican administration's policies, especially those dealing with Latin America.

The protestors behaved with decorum, as did most of the Bush supporters at the rally. But the small group who overreacted to the protestors cast a bad light on the whole gathering. This group, led by State Senator Carl Koella, denied the protestors, launching insults and profanity at them. They even verbally assaulted the Echo's assistant editor, who was covering the rally.

Such behavior was inexcusable from "adult" men, and especially so from a state lawmaker. Are Senator Koella and his supporters so very frightened of opinions differing from their own? Protesting, if done peaceably, is a valid method of expressing viewpoints; apparently, these men at the rally didn't see it that way.

A third set of protests -- the biggest and most publicized -- was, of course, directed at Westown Theater's showing of The Last Temptation. Although most of the protestors exercised their right to assembly decorously, some overstepped the bounds of organized protesting, shouting at moviegoers and, in some cases, even blocking the theatre doors. The anti-protestors sometimes matched this behavior. After a raucous Friday night, Westown security had to enclose part of the parking lot, both to contain and to protect the protestors.

Protesting to express one's political or moral opinions is a much-abused and often misunderstood right. Both bad behavior and bad stereotypes need to end, so that protesting can safely and beneficially continue.

Change worry's 'what if' to anticipation's 'if then'

by Robert J. Kriegel, Ph.D.

(CPS) -- Worrying is the negative national pastime. Everybody does it, and very few find that it is a positive experience.

You don't think clearly or perform well when you worry. Your main focus is the worry, the fear of "what might happen if..." which overwhelms you, makes you feel depressed, reduces your energy, and prevents you from getting your work done.

College students are big worriers. That worry leads to stress, and college students are very big on stress. In fact, the Nuprin Pain Report, the first national study on pain in America, documented that more people aged 18 to 24 are likely to suffer stress and pain than any older age group.

Most of what we worry about is out of our control. You can't control other people's responses, a grade a professor will give you, whether someone will agree with you, what they think of you, how the weather or the traffic will be, what your roommate will do, how you will get enough money, how you look, or what the future will hold. The more we worry about things we can't control, the worse everything gets.

Remember this rule of thumb: you can't control other people or external situations. But you can control how well you prepare for and prepare for and respond to them. In other words, you control your information, attitude, and actions.

Worrying is manifested in two words:

"what if." "What if they say no," "what if I don't get the money," "what if the professor assigns..." The key to beating the worries is to change the "what ifs" to "if...then's": "If they say no, then I will..." "If I don't get the money, then I will..."

Always change the worry to anticipation. Concentrating your energy on what you can change, rather than dwelling on things you can't control, increases your confidence and prepares you for any situation.

President John F. Kennedy used this strategy. Before his press conferences Kennedy and his aides anticipated any possible question or situation that could arise and developed answers for them. Whether a reporter asked about the Vietnam War, the economy, or civil rights, Kennedy was prepared.

Likewise, in a job interview, instead of worrying whether the potential employer will ask about your grades, anticipate that he or she will. Then mentally list wins, accomplishments, and qualifications that your course grades might not reflect.

Get into the habit of anticipating any pressure situation, whether it's an exam, an interview, a date, or a tennis serve. Make a "worry list," then change each worry ("what if") to an anticipation ("if...then"). Leaving your worries behind by focusing on what you can control enables you to concentrate your energy and perform at peak levels.

Students share thrill of Discovery shuttle launch, Sept. 15

Editor, Highland Echo:

I just wanted to share a moment of pride with you. This moment occurred at Issac's Snack Bar when silence stole across the room, all eyes directed toward the TV and breaths were held in anticipation of the shuttle launch.

It seemed a thousand unvoiced fears and questions hovered in the air the brief moments before the take-off. And when it successfully launched, the tension was still there, everyone waiting, counting, and praying history would not repeat itself in tragedy.

And finally, after almost three minutes elapsed, a loud cheer and applause split the silence. America is in space again.

It was a special bond we strangers shared...the pride of the American spirit. It was my good fortune to be present.

Powell joins English faculty

by Bill Householder

He rarely wears a watch, he knows offhand the origin of the word "quaalude," and he's one of the new faces in MC classrooms this fall.

David Powell is a 1967 graduate of Maryville College, so coming back to teach here is like a sort of homecoming. Originally from Philadelphia, he came to Tennessee around 1965 and entered MC. He liked MC and East Tennessee so much that he decided to stay here.

After graduation, Powell, who had majored in biology before switching to English in his junior year, taught high school biology and chemistry right outside of Camden, New Jersey. After graduate school he taught at MC from 1975 until 1977.

He taught at UT for 15 years, during which time he won an award for Most Outstanding Instructor of the year.

Powell has had two books of poetry published, My Watermelon Man in 1970 and Strawberries in 1977. In 1966, he became the first student to write a novel for his independent study; under the supervision of Dr. Edwin Hunter, Powell created Cholly and Other Stories. All three of these books are available in the library.

When he first worked at MC, Powell helped one of his former students, Jane Richardson, former dean of students and current coordinator of special events, find a job on campus. Then in the summer of 1987, he came by to visit her and was offered a job to teach here again.

"It was a nice little coincidence," Powell said of Richardson's transition from being in his class to being the person who brings him back to MC. "The fact that I wound up at Maryville College, where I started, I could never have anticipated," he added.

Currently, Powell teaches four English classes: two units of English 104, English 311 (History of the English Language), and English 333 (17th-century poetry). When asked which was his favorite class, Powell

'We don't want to grow up'

(CPS) -- There should be plenty of career choices available to ambitious teens, a survey by TDK Electronics Corporation discovered, since there are so many unambitious ones.

A survey of 1,900 teenagers revealed that 16 percent want to be doctors when they grow up. Thirteen percent reported they want to be lawyers.

But a whopping 63 percent said, "I don't want to grow up."

statement, he said, "I have a very distaste [sic] of this trash," referring to the protestors.

Dr. Elizabeth Perez-Reilly, associate professor of Spanish, was one of the protestors. She said of this treatment, "I think they're [the Republicans] being rude. We are here protesting peacefully, and have had people making animal noises and just generally being rude."

Julie Marshall, an '88 graduate of MC, said, "A few people were abusive."

On the other hand, Peggy Lambert, who was there to attend the rally, said, "I think they [the protestors] are infringing on my right to assemble. The noise level interfered with me trying to listen."

marked the beginning of what appears to be an active year for the Student Senate. All meetings are open, and students are encouraged to attend. They happen on the second and fourth Thursdays of each month in the CCM at 12:30 p.m. Bills may be written by any student, but they must be sponsored and presented by a senator.

Cost of college education keeps rising: College Board

by Michael O'Keefe

(CPS) -- The price students pay to attend college has increased faster than the general inflation rate for the eighth year in a row, according to the College Board; many students say they will have to scramble to find the money.

"My parents pay for my tuition," University of Virginia senior Susie Bruce said; "My mom is a nurse, and she's working extra shifts until I graduate to pay for my tuition."

"I know it's going to hurt me," said University of Illinois junior David Dunphy, whose tuition rose $306, from $2,092 to $2,398. "I'll be able to make it. A lot of my friends won't. I'll work in a record store or McDonalds." He added, "I worked 20 hours a week last year. I don't know how I'll be able to work more, but you do what you can to make up the difference."

The average student will pay seven percent more for tuition and fees this academic year, the College Board found in its annual tuition report released in mid-August. Inflation, as measured by consumer prices, was four percent since fall 1987.

Prices for the average public four-year school increased an average of four percent, to $1,483. At private four-year schools, tuition and fees shot up an average of nine percent, to $6,457. The average increases for two-year schools were five percent for public schools and nine percent for private institutions.

The good news, noted Bob Aaron of the National Association of State Universities and Land-Grant Colleges, is that such jumps are smaller than the double-digit increases of the early 1980s. He said, "The trend is a decrease in the increase."

Whatever the trend, it hasn't kept students out of class. While official numbers are not out yet, many campuses received record numbers of applications for fall term, indicating that Americans are willing to pay more for college.

"People want to get a college degree and will pay whatever it takes to get it," said Bruce Carnes, deputy undersecretary of education, who believes colleges are charging more because they know that their consumers -- students -- can simply turn around and borrow more from the federal government. "Under those circumstances, there are no constraints on price," he said.

University of Rochester researchers, for example, determined that lowering tuition doesn't necessarily draw more students to campus. "There was no evidence that tuition drop would improve market position, research consultant Beverly Joyce said.

"The public doesn't view shopping around for college like [shopping] for other consumer items," said Rochester Vice-president Jim Scannell. "They're looking for quality, and they're not willing to trade that off."

"Investing in a college education for oneself and one's children may well be the second largest consumer purchase, second only to buying a house," said Kathleen Broder of the College Board.

Despite the trend, some schools didn't raise their prices, and some even reduced them. New York's Sullivan County Community

Protests erupt at film's opening

by Jim Rice

Protests and counter-protests marred the opening of The Last Temptation of Christ, September 23, at Knoxville's Westown Theater. Most of the protests were nonconfrontational, but there were a few arguments.

Most of the protestors were against the showing of the picture, with only a few people opposing the "censorship" that the protestors supported.

One protestor, John Stone, said, "I have no objections to people seeing the movie, but I do disagree with the distortions of the Scripture."

Other protestors were not as forgiving. One minister said that seeing the movie would condemn the viewers to Hell. Another protestor echoed these sentiments, saying, "If God is in you, then you would not blaspheme Him by seeing this movie."

The counter-protestors were outnumbered approximately ten to one, they were extremely vocal.

One fellow, who identified himself only as "Beelzebub," paraded around in a red satin costume while playing hard rock on his car stereo. Another, Jessamy Thomison, said that the protests were "A circus; If it [the movie] I had not had all the free publicity, it would have bombed out in two weeks."

Another, Arun Rattan, a recently nationalized citizen, said that protestors had no right to tell him not to see the movie, because they had no right to try to influence him, as an individual. "After all, isn't that what America is about?" he asked one of the protestors.

During the protests, a man drove through the crowd, injuring protestors and sending three to the hospital. Two were taken to University of Tennessee Hospital; they were Judith Taylor and Royce DeVault.

Contradictory reports of the incident came from the protestors. Allegedly the driver, Roy H. Bass, Jr.,

Last Temptation

by Jennifer C. Worth

At the heart of the hubbub surrounding The Last Temptation of Christ is a movie -- a movie whose cinematic strengths and weaknesses are usually overlooked in favor of heated debate, pro and con, often by people who haven't even bothered to see the movie.

And that's a shame, primarily because it's always damaging to individual dignity when people dogmatically accept someone's judgement out of hand. It's also an unfortunate situation because The Last Temptation is a movie worth seeing.

The Last Temptation is essentially a movie of "moments" -- powerful, moving segments linked by weaker segues. Those strong moments redeem the otherwise weak movie, spiritually and emotionally.

After an initial bout with overacting Willem Dafoe portrays Jesus as a sympathetic protagonist of powerful and often conflicting emotions. Although Dafoe's Jesus lacks the charisma that the historical Jesus must have possessed, the character is usually convincing, as when he berates the villagers for stoning Magdalene when they themselves are not free of sin. After decades of movie Christs who glow self-righteously with the inner light of retail-store paintings, Dafoe's portrayal is a welcome change.

said, "I don't have a favorite, because equal with that [17th-century poetry] is the linguistics class. They're two different types of classes altogether...the students are so good, the attendance is so good, and these things are so unusual compared to UT, where attendance is slack, where the students don't particularly do their homework and so forth."

"I can't say I have a favorite...we're having a ball in both of them," he concluded.

Protestors admonish moviegoers to boycott The Last Temptation of Christ, showing at Knoxville's Westown Theater.

His goal for the future is to live more and more in the present: "...A goal to me is rarely something far off; a goal to me is to live fully right now, so my goals are always for the present. To live with more awareness, to be more loving, to be more attentive to what people say, and to enjoy what's right here, because I don't know anything else."

"The future is nebulous, in fact non-existent. The past is the past; there's nothing that can be done. In other words, I try to be more complete and whole in everything I do, so my goal is always for the present," he said.

Of Powell, Craig Canevit, a junior enrolled in both History of the English Language and 17th-century Poetry, said, "I think he's probably the most well-received change that the campus has seen. Every other thing has had its good sides and its bad sides. I've only heard one half-negative comment about Mr. Powell. Someone didn't like the way that he cursed a little bit, but I think everyone else likes that type of frankness."

Canevit added, "It's the one class that I've had that I've looked forward to going [to] every single day. ...He knows so much, it's incredible. It's a whole body of knowledge, not just English literature...and he tie it together so well. I think he should be made a full professor at Maryville College."

Arthur Bushing, chair of the Department of Languages and Literature, said that Powell "...is very knowledgeable, very thorough, very conscientious. He is just a fellow with a tremendous amount of imagination, tremendous amount of ability, and I think he is a valuable addition, at this point, to our department."

Jazz's one-man band plays Simple Pleasures

by Bill Householder

Bobby McFerrin is a unique talent, a jazz singer who doesn't always sing and a musician who uses no other instruments than his voice.

After several years of making his Fascinating Rhythm solely for the jazz community, McFerrin now enters the pop mainstream, so he has good reason to follow his hit song's motto: "Don't Worry, Be Happy."

Simple Pleasures is McFerrin's fourth album, and it is a departure from his previous albums in that it contains less jazz and more classic rock. He covers such classic tunes as Cream's "Sunshine of Your Love," The Young Rascals' "Good Lovin'," and The Beatles' "Drive My Car."

McFerrin's music is happy and upbeat. This characteristic is, of course, most evident in his number one chart-buster "Don't Worry, Be Happy." Other songs, such as the title track and "Come to Me," are equally upbeat.

Also, unlike his other albums, Simple

Pleasures is not live, which somewhat takes away from the improvisational spontaneity of his music and his "have fun" attitude toward performing. The studio venue, however, does show what a vocal virtuoso he is, which is extremely evident in the "guitar solo" in "Sunshine of Your Love."

All of the tracks on the album are excellent.

Of the tracks McFerrin himself wrote, "Don't Worry, Be Happy," "Come to Me," and "Drive" are the best.

Incidentally, "Drive" is the same song he performed for his first Levi's 501 Blues TV commercial, and "Don't Worry, Be Happy" is the first cappella song to be number one on Billboard's Top 40.

I was disappointed with "Drive My Car," considering the way McFerrin covered other Beatle classics like "Blackbird" and "From Me to You" with such an attention to their original form, but, nevertheless, in McFerrin's hands it is well done, if widely divergent from the original.

Big names give Sci-Fi larger share of publishing market

from Bridge Publications

In the eleven-billion-dollar a year American book publishing industry, speculative fiction has come of age.

Science fiction, and its sister genres, fantasy and horror, now attract millions of readers each year. These three types of fiction -- encompassed by the term "speculative fiction" -- have grown to form a significant part of the publishing industry, led by big-name authors, such as Stephen King, L. Ron Hubbard, Robert A. Heinlein, Arthur C. Clarke, and Isaac Asimov.

The trend over the past ten years, if measured by total sales volume alone, is one of overall growth. In 1984, a Gallup poll survey found that speculative fiction titles accounted for a full 10 percent of the total fiction books purchased in America, with significant headway being made on national bestseller lists beginning in 1982.

"We now have a generation of adult readers who were raised on Star Trek and Star Wars and for whom it is nothing unusual to pick up a science fiction book once in a while," Toni Weiskopf, assistant editor of science fiction and fantasy books at Baen Books, said. "A lot more people include speculative fiction in the types of books they like to read."

In fact, of the 52 books that sold over 100,000 copies in hardcover during 1987, 14 were speculative fiction, according to Publishers Weekly best sellers round-up. Five years ago, there were only five speculative fiction novels that broke the 100,000 sales mark. Prior to that it was almost unheard-of.

"There is no question that much of the increase in the overall sales statistics of speculative fiction is heavily influenced by the sales of a few big best-selling authors," Scott Welch, senior vice-president of Bridge Publications, said.

Welch added, "As occurred shortly after World War II, with Hubbard and Heinlein being among the first speculative fiction writers to be published in hardcover, big names make a big difference. The occasional speculative fiction reader, someone who perhaps only read three or four titles each year, usually turns to the names he or she has heard of -- Hubbard, Heinlein, King, Asimov, or Clarke."

Peter Heck, editor of Waldenbooks' science fiction magazine, Xignals, agreed. Citing the appeal to a broader went so far as to say that the counter-protestors were going to Hell for their signs, which read "Censorship: Made in the U.S.S.R." and "Hypocrites will be closest to the fire."

Another protestor said that, while the only thing a person could be condemned to Hell for was rejection of Christ, seeing the movie was not spiritually healthy. One protestor quoted Matthew 24:24: "For false Christs and false prophets will arise... so as to mislead even the elect."

The protestors all agreed that they would stay as long as this "blasphemy" continued in Knoxville.

audience, he said that the stories from the big names in speculative fiction "are more dramatic and focus on character development and character interaction," which helps to make best sellers.

The overall sales figures, however, can be deceptive of the broad picture of speculative fiction. The explosion of popularity does not necessarily mean that more science fiction titles are being published every year.

Berkeley, for instance, has not expanded the number of titles for several years. And, according to Susan Allison, vice-president and editor-in-chief of science fiction at Berkeley, the company is holding to ten science fiction titles again in this year's program. "It is the big best-selling authors who are selling far more copies," she said.

So, a King, a Hubbard, or a Heinlein can heavily weight the overall sales statistics. One of their books counts for a lot of average speculative fiction books that may only sell 50 or 60 thousand copies.

The same trend, however, is found in most other genres of writing as well. The sure money for publishing companies typically lies in a name -- the name of a big best-selling author.

DOE trains grad

by Jana Dalton

If you've dared to consider the "great beyond" -- beyond MC, that is -- the Career Planning and Placement (CPP) office encourages you to know that the careers are out there. Finding them just takes energy and commitment.

So says Lisa Harvey Linginfelter, who is now one of an 11-member group to participate in the Department of Energy's (DOE) "Management Internship Development Program" (MIDP).

The theory behind this DOE program is "to develop management for the future," so they have organized a five-year internship plan to train tomorrow's management forces.

Linginfelter, a 1988 MC graduate with a double major in English and math, was chosen from among 120 applicants. She has been assigned to her first-year DOE headquarters in the Environment, Safety, and Health Division. Her next year will be spent in one of the various operations offices which implement the policies and directives issued by the DOE.

In the third year of the internship, Linginfelter will be "hired" by a specific office to continue generalized training. And the fourth and fifth years will involve specialized training or graduate school, with DOE picking up the tab.

The advantage of the internship, Linginfelter explained, is not solely extensive opportunities for higher education, but the advanced status achieved at the end of the five years. Normally a DOE employee simply accumulates experience. Linginfelter and the other interns will be categorized under "special training" which includes an overview of DOE and its department. This training is very favorable for any management-related position.

The first step towards Linginfelter's internship began at the CPP. Jean Jones, CPP director, advised Linginfelter to contact alumni at DOE's Oak Ridge office. Linginfelter, along with Julie Dodd Ramsey, another 1988 grad, applied for a budget-analysis position.

Later, both were nominated for the MIDP, but Ramsey accepted the budget-analysis position and is currently employed at Oak Ridge. Linginfelter the MIDP accepted and began her orientation in August.

When asked about her feelings toward DOE, whose primary functions are construction of nuclear weapons and development of safer, more efficient, and more economic energy for the future, Linginfelter said "When you think 'nuclear,' you only think of weapons -- but there's more." She explained that the potential for nuclear energy is great, considering that a piece of uranium the size of pencil eraser is equal in energy potential to three tons of coal.

DOE is involved in such projects as researching fossil fuel and strategic petroleum reserves, storing nuclear wastes, and maintaining safety standards at nuclear plants.

DOE is also part of the international issue of "Global Warming." Linginfelter said that DOE provided "the opportunity to do something beneficial for the country and the world."

She is understandably enthusiastic about her prospects with DOE, but she emphasized the potential for other MC graduates. She was the only intern selected from a small college and believes that other MC grads "have what DOE is looking for."

She encourages those who appreciate intellectual curiosity, commitment, mobility, and dedication to contact her through the CPP office. The DOE will be recruiting next year and Linginfelter will possibly be their representative here.

She stressed that a variety of majors are acceptable for MIDP, especially, engineering and science majors. She said, "DOE is so diverse, it's good for anyone."

AIDS hasn't changed college students' sexual habits

(CPS) -- More evidence emerged last week that indicates that the AIDS scare has not markedly changed students' sexual habits.

More than 700,000 men aged 18 to 29 have had at least 10 sexual partners during the last year, a Center for Disease Control (CDC) study found, putting them at "considerable risk" of getting AIDS or other sexually transmitted diseases.

AIDS, a virus which fatally destroys the body's immune system, is spread by contaminated blood products, sharing hypodermic needles with infected people, or by having sex with someone who is carrying the virus.

There have been about 70,000 reported AIDS cases in the United States.

The disease's spread, of course, provoked a wave of efforts -- ranging from government pamphlets sent to every American home to the installation of condom vending machines in campus washrooms -- to persuade citizens to adopt "safe sex" practices.

The result of the efforts seem mixed. Some reports indicate students -- a relatively promiscuous sector of the population -- have changed their sexual habits, while others indicate they haven't.

A University of Wisconsin study conducted last year indicated that half the students at the Madison campus had changed their sexual behavior. A March poll conducted by the Michigan State University campus paper, the State News, revealed the AIDS threat had moved almost three quarters of the students there to make some changes in their sexual activities.

But University of Texas researcher Dr. Scott Spear reported that students are still contracting other sexually transmitted diseases, indicating that students aren't heeding efforts to practice safe sex. And a 1987 survey of college students by Blotnick Associates, a New York polling firm, revealed that only six percent of men think about AIDS before choosing sexual partners.

The new CDC study, in fact, showed that "most Americans appear to be at relatively low risk of infection," Dr. William Darrow said in releasing the findings September 24.

"However," Darrow added, "a sizable percentage of young, never-married men report more than 10 sexual partners in the past 12 months."

About five percent of all the young men questioned in the CDC survey claimed they'd had more than 10 partners.

Review from p. 4

In fact, the entire movie -- its scenery, costumes, and casting -- is a break with the cinematic tradition set by the early deMille Bible epics. These apostles are men who worked hard in a harsh land, men to whom a faith in peace did not come easily. The shepherd Nathaniel, the weather-beaten and dignified Peter, the violent zealot Saul (later Paul), and Jesus himself have all known physical hardship and spiritual drought, so their ultimate acceptance of Christianity is more inspiring than the conversion of a group of well-heeled Biblical "yuppies."

This image is one that director Martin Scorsese consciously crafted, seeking to depict New Testament events as they might have happened to real men and women, so as to make them more meaningful for today's real men and women.

He succeeds in this goal although some inconsistencies and cheesy special effects (Satan's voice booming from an unconvincing plume of flame) hold Last Temptation back from technical and artistic perfection, it is, in its final impact, a stirring film.

Especially noteworthy are the costumes -- obviously well-researched and convincingly executed -- and the score by Peter Gabriel, with help from numerous Middle Eastern and African singers and musicians, including Youssou N'Dour.

Bloom, Bennett sponsor 'think tank'

(CPS) -- William Bennett and Allan Bloom, two of higher education's most caustic critics, are teaming up to put their money where their mouths are and teach college students the way they think it should be done.

Bennett, the outgoing U.S. Secretary of Education and Bloom, a University of Chicago professor and best-selling author, will establish the Madison Center, an education think-tank that will sponsor summer seminars in the humanities and "great books" for a select group of 50 to 100 undergraduates, said Bennett aide John Walters.

The seminars with top humanities professors drawn from across the country will "give students the kind of education Bennett and Bloom say they need," Walters said.

Bennett has been engaged in an ongoing confrontation with the nation's colleges since he was named to the head of the Department of Education three-and-a-half years ago.

He has often accused colleges of watering down their curricula and allowing students to graduate without exposure to the classics of history, philosophy, or literature.

Bloom's The Closing of the American Mind: How Higher Education Has Failed Democracy and Impoverished the Souls of Today's Students took a similar tack. . . book, published in 1987, blasted both colleges and students as too self-involved to teach or to learn. It remains a campus best-seller.

The Madison Center also will serve as a public policy forum on education and other issues, said Walters, Bennett's chief of staff and a onetime graduate of Bloom's at the University of Toronto.

The seminars will last three to four weeks, featuring classes with five to ten professors and guest lecturers. They will be held at a yet unchosen campus, with the costs underwritten by the Madison Center, not students.

Program from p.1

"If there is something going on on campus and they need help need to organize it, we [Student Programming] will do it," she said.

The popular game show, Win, Lose, or Draw gave Student Programming the idea to have a tournament of the drawing-charades game, which is tentatively scheduled for November.

O'Brien and the Student Programming chairpersons, Davey Reed, Chuck Costello, and Ellen Foreman, are working on activities for homecoming weekend. A color war is planned to decorate the campus. Each dorm and several buildings will be assigned one color and the group that displays the most of that color will win.

O'Brien said of the contest, "We want to get common colors so everyone can use that color and be creative with it. We want the campus to look festive."

A dance, pep rally, talent show, and a special video presentation are in the works for that weekend also.

Student programming is making plans for the Christmas season as well. The "Hanging of the Greens" and a Christmas-tree-lighting ceremony are just two of the things Student Programming has planned.

In order to make students aware of all the activities on the campus, O'Brien says a large calendar will be placed on the bulletin board outside the CCM and in several other places on campus. "We want students to be able to see at a glance that there is a lot happening on the Maryville College campus," O'Brien said.

SHORTS

(OCR) Wanted: non-greeks to live in Greek houses. Several University of Tennessee-Knoxville fraternities rented rooms to non-Greeks this summer. Renter qualifications included trustworthiness and ability to get along with members remaining in town during the summer. And the advantages? The frats earned a little extra revenue, and the renters got a great bargain. Rent for the whole summer ranged $200 to $300.

(OCR) More skirts: Women 18-24 years old bought 85 percent more skirts in 1987 than in the previous year. Sales of jeans, meanwhile, went up only two percent. (Source: Campus Market Report, August 1988)

(OCR) A female condom may be on the market by the end of 1988, if the FDA approves. The Wisconsin Pharmacal Co. is testing the condom in Europe and some midwest cities. It's made of polyurethane and is inserted in the vagina like a tampon. A ring at the inner end fits over the cervix like a diaphragm; at the other end, a larger ring remains outside the vagina. In European studies, women reported the device is easy to use, and men said they preferred it to a male condom.

(OCR) Free typing: Top University of Minnesota officials have learned that some men's athletic department counselors have typed papers for football players -- a possible violation of the NCAA's extra-benefit rule. In response, Elayne Donahue, director of athletic academic counseling, has discontinued the service: "My office will provide a list of typists and their fees."

Tuition from p.3

College, for one, reduced its tuition from $1,510 to $1,430. The University of Mississippi held its tuition at $1,780. Eastern Arizona College kept its tuition at $500.

A few campus observers think such price have hit a limit. "There's a feeling out there among the electorate that college costs are going beyond their reach," said Jennifer Afton of the Education Commission for the States.

Afton and others believe that states, banks and governments will have to develop pre-payment tuition plans, savings bond programs, and other ways to keep students registering in the future.

"We are, of course, not at all surprised by the increases," Carnes said. "We have stated that, so far as we can see, the price of college is going to go up at this rate forever. We don't see anything in the immediate offing to exert very much restraint on these increases."

"Never once, anything I've seen, have the said maybe schools should look at themselves as tightwad," added Robert Loefer, president of York College. York raised its tuition 10 percent this year, well under the national average.

College officials argue that they need more money to replace aging facilities, to increase faculty salaries to stop professors from leaving for higher paying jobs in private industry, and to provide more financial aid for low-income students.

Campuses need to get the money from students, moreover, because state and federal governments generally have cut the amount of money they appropriate for colleges.

Flames damage Carnegie parts

by Andi Bristol

A small fire struck parts of Carnegie Hall October 10, but most of the building remained undamaged.

Two unidentified students, reported to Security that they smelled smoke coming from Carnegie Hall at 1:38 a.m.

Upon further inspection MC security officer, Ralph O'Neal determined that there was indeed a fire in the building and notified the fire department, said Andy McCall, head of maintenance.

"The fire marshal said that in ten more minutes, it [the building] would have been gone," said Donna Davis, business manager.

The fire started on a mattress placed in the middle of a hallway on the second floor. Nearby was a metal can with ashes inside, indicating that paper had been burned in it.

Although Carnegie has been plagued by vandalism since its closing in 1982, the fire was probably an accident rather than an act of malice. "There is no evidence that this was intentional," Davis said.

The main damage was contained to the flooring and ceiling between the first and second floors. The walls on the first, second, and third floors however, were also damaged, as was one floor joist.

As a result of the fire, the number of security checks for Carnegie has been increased, and the basement windows will be boarded up, said McCall.

The future of Carnegie is uncertain at this point. However, if the trend toward increased enrollment continues, MC will need more housing space.

"Our hope is that we will bring it [Carnegie] back as a dorm for upper-classmen by the 1990's," said Davis. She then added, referring to the fire, "If it's not standing, we can't renovate it."

Tina Stanley's Inquiry class is going to do a service project cleaning up Carnegie.

As a matter of safety, both McCall and Davis urged students to use positive peer pressure to discourage anyone from illegally entering the building.

Americans earn more diplomas, degrees now

(CPS) -- There are more Americans walking around with high school diplomas and college degrees than ever before, the U.S. Census Bureau reported last week.

It means the nation believes education is an increasingly important part of adulthood, observers said.

"The entire post-Second World War era has been characterized by an expansion of educational opportunities and structures in the country," Census Bureau demographer Robert Kominski noted.

Consequently, as of March, 1987, Kominski reported, more than 75 percent of people aged 25 and older had completed high school, nearly 29 percent had finished at least four years of college. By comparison, in 1940 only 25 percent of Americans aged 25 and older had completed high school, and five percent had college degrees.

"In the 1960s the civil rights movement added another level of opportunity. And the expansion of college grant and aid programs in the '60s and '70s allowed this to continue," Kominski said.

By 1987, males were slightly more likely to have finished high school than females, 76 percent to 75 percent. Kominski pointed out that women led the high school graduate category as recently as the 1970s, and attributed the change to an increasing number of black men pursuing their educations.

MC Homecoming Weekend to celebrate old, new

by Jennifer C. Worth

New additions and old traditions dot the schedule for Homecoming Weekend, October 21-22.

This year's theme is "Making Connections." Davey Reed of the Homecoming Committee said of this theme, "We've taken it and applied it to alumni -- not just recent graduates but all alumni since the 1800s." He added, "We've gone back to the origins of the college."

The banner will depict people dressed in clothing from the nineteenth century to modern decades all standing on the Maryville College bridge.

One modern way that the committee has interpreted the theme is the use of a video camera to film vignettes of campus life -- some planned and some candid -- which students and alumni can view in Isaac's immediately following Friday night's pep rally.

"There should be some really fun stuff," said Reed of the video, which he, Martin Capetz, and Student Life Director Leslie Nier will film.

For most students, the highlight of Homecoming Weekend is the traditional semi-formal dance. This year's dance will be held in the Margaret Ware Dining Room, Pearson Hall, from 10 p.m. to 1 a.m. Saturday night. Admission is five dollars per person.

Dance decorations will focus on the theme. Ellen Foreman, member of the Homecoming Committee, described the dance's decorations as "a melding of different eras at MC." She added, "If it comes off, it is going to be really nice."

Reed revealed that a professional disc jockey will emcee the dance's music; music at the event is "always a big issue," he said.

Both Reed and Foreman said that they hoped to have a photographer for official dance portraits, but there are no official arrangements as yet. Foreman noted that, in any case, the decorations will include a backdrop where photos can be made.

Another traditional feature of Homecoming, the parade through downtown Maryville, is not on the schedule this year. "A lot of people were disappointed about the parade; they said that it was our only connection with the community," Reed said.

Hassles over equipment, however, have consistently dogged parade plans; "It was decided this summer to eliminate the parade," Reed said. Comparing the relative merits and problems of having a parade, he noted, "It's a tradeoff; it's a give-and-take."

One tradition remains

Event reminds MC to connect

The images conjured by Homecoming are varied: fall weather, sports, seeing family and friends, and get-togethers of all sorts. The occasion has been touted as an opportunity for fellowship and school spirit, it has also been derided as corny and outdated.

The inspiration behind Homecoming is summarized in this year's theme, "Making Connections." As the term "Homecoming" implies, the connections are usually between returning alumni and their alma mater. We propose a broader interpretation.

Connections of all sorts are integral to a well-rounded education. One learns to draw connections between abstract ideas and concrete examples, to relate different disciplines to each other. We tend to forget that we are here to accumulate a body of knowledge rather than discrete bits of information.

There are other connections to be made on campus. We are so often reminded of the numerous friendships formed during the college years -- both students and with faculty -- that it has become a college cliché to mention this obvious condition of campus life. These are connections that we tend to make in the course of everyday activity; Homecoming is, in part, a time to recognize and celebrate them.

We need not limit our perspective to an insular campus community, for to become well-rounded and well-educated adults, we must make connections beyond the college environment.

During these transitional years, we began to redefine ourselves; our redefinitions must include our place in the world. By making connections with broader interests and issues, we approach this goal.

MC students have made cooperative efforts to make these connections, on community, national, and international levels. Recently, their efforts have included the protest at the September 26. Bush-for-President rally. These students' efforts to express their political viewpoints were not always welcome (see Echo, vol. 74, no. 2), but were nonetheless a valid assertion of their rights.

The Student Senate-sponsored voter registration drive, October 3-5, was a similar effort to make connections, both among students and between the college and the "outside world." Voting is an important, if understated, way to be involved in the political process that we learn about at MC.

The presidential debate symposium/CIV, sponsored by the Student Senate, is another example.

Although these examples have all come from politics, there are other types of connections: cultural, artistic, and spiritual. The CIV programs, the CCM, the foreign student program, the Peace Education Task Force, and various other groups on campus provide opportunities for making connections in any of these venues.

Individual students, however, can seek their own options and, if they wish, make their own connections.

Obviously, these efforts cannot be compressed into a single weekend! Homecoming is only a symbol of the connections that we make, consciously or unconsciously, year-round, in and out of college.

Before we over- or under-sentimentalize Homecoming, we should reflect on its broader implications and, of course, we can have fun this weekend, too.

Title game ensnares students

by Jana Dalton

It happened again. My eyebrows were frozen once more from the icy glare I received when I accidentally misused a professor's title.

Specific names have been omitted to protect the innocent, (me!) but a challenge must be issued for someone to solve the dilemma of "Who is what?"

What is in a name anyway?

Considering the thousands of college hours and the thousands and thousands of dollars it takes to achieve the elevating degree of "Dr.," credit should be given where credit is due. Fair enough.

Most professors do not write their name on the blackboard every day for a week, like the "good ole days" of kindergarten, and the idea of having "Dr." tattooed on the forehead is unappealing to most. How, then are we to determine correct titles?

I truly believe, even in this era of non-traditional concepts, that the majority of students strive to render the proper respect to their elders. Normally, a "Mr." or "Mrs." would suffice. But it is incredibly frustrating, if not downright irritating, when I initiate a conversation only to be abruptly corrected with "That's 'Dr.' so and so!"

It's not as if alternatives haven't been tested. I experimented with first names only. Yet the disdainful shudders by the faculty member were too uncomfortable. The blanket approach of calling everyone "Dr." seemed a brilliant solution -- right? Wrong!

To my dismay, not all the professors at MC have reached this stage in their careers. And, for some strange reason, after this particular error I always apologized to the professor, which suggested faintly that I regretted they did not have doctorates.

I won't even dwell on the complications surrounding female professors who force you to face the choice among "Miss," "Mrs.," "Ms.," or was that perhaps "Ms. Doc?"

So a plea is directed to the faculty, the molders of men and women of academia: Can someone eliminate the fumbling and mumbling and explain "Who's Doc and Who's not?"

Want ads' lingo confounds meaning

by Dan Fox

Like most interested people, I read the newspaper for general information, so as usual I read the Maryville/Alcoa Daily Times Wednesday, October 5. Nothing really caught my attention as I browsed through the pages, so for fun I started searching through the Classified section. In the "Help Wanted" ads, I found an assortment of jobs, but a few of the ads were a bit bizarre if taken literally.

The first one that I read described an interesting position:

"PART-TIME
Women/men -- work from home servicing our customers. Up to $6-$8 per hour. For local interview call 983-8146."

To start with, what are "part-time women/men?" The term hermaphrodite comes to mind.

Now, what kind of service are these women/men to give? I believe that if we research the state laws, it's probably illegal. Also, who are the customers?

After pondering one of life's unanswered questions concerning people of questionable gender/sex, my eyes caught a doctor's office ad:

"PROGRESSIVE
DOCTOR'S Office in Maryville seeks another energetic, loyal front office person who, enjoys a fast pace. Duties include scheduling appointments, billing, insurance

Blood shortage strikes area; Medic issues E. Tenn. appeal

by Jennifer C. Worth

East Tennessee has survived gas and water shortages; now the area faces a more life-threatening crisis: a blood shortage.

The Knoxville Medic office, which serves Blount, and Knox, and 14 other counties in East Tennessee and Southern Kentucky, issued an emergency appeal last week for blood donors.

"We have a need for all blood types, especially A-positive, O-positive, and O-negative," said Jeannine McKamey, Medic communications coordinator.

The seriousness of the shortage is evidenced by the fact that Medic made an emergency media appeal; "Going to the media is our last resort," McKamey said.

Medic's first move in a shortage is to call in reserve donors; then they call national blood exchange services, which have contacts with blood banks across the country. Neither policy was enough to fulfill local need.

The causes for the shortage are twofold. Increased demand for the blood supply is seasonal, since many people opt to have elective surgery in autumn to avoid hospitalization in summer or during the holidays.

A secondary cause of the shortage is decreased donations; "Donations are down somewhat," McKamey said. "Lots of people have viruses right now," she added.

In addition to regular office hours, Medic sponsors periodic blood drives; their next visit to Blount County will be a Community Drive November 18 at Wal-Mart, Foothills Plaza.

Medic is also sponsoring a special drive in conjunction with UT's football game against Kentucky. This "Blue-Orange Battle Cry for Blood" will be November 14 through 18; fans of the two universities will be competing to see which group donates more blood.

In addition to these community drives, Medic holds an annual drive on campus in cooperation with a campus organization. "We usually have these drives in the spring, but we'd love to sponsor one in December," said Donor Resources Coordinator Claudia Norris. She urges a campus group to contact her about the possibility.

Medic's Knoxville office is located downtown at Locust Street and Sumner Place. They take donations from 8 a.m. to 6:30 p.m. on weekdays, from 8 to 11:30 a.m. on Saturdays, and from 1 to 4 p.m. on Sundays. Their phone number is 524-3074.

Dr. Glen Hewitt joins the faculty as a professor of religion and philosophy.

Hewitt brings new smile to Religion/Philosophy

by Missy Pankake

MC has a new professor of religion and philosophy -- Dr. Glen Hewitt. His friendly smile can usually be found in the CCM.

Hewitt was born in Maryland and earned his double major of religion and philosophy at Wake Forest University in North Carolina.

Raised a Southern Baptist, Hewitt said that he was always interested in religion. He decided to add a major in philosophy after taking a required philosophy course.

After college, Hewitt went to Alaska with a Southern Baptist, Peace Corp-like program called US-2. He was a campus minister in Anchorage for the two years of the program. "I loved it," he said, "especially Alaska." It was in Alaska that he met his wife.

When the two years were over, Hewitt left Alaska and entered the University of Chicago's Divinity school. He earned his Ph.D., with an emphasis on theological ethics, but was not ordained a minister.

Next, Hewitt went to Stetson University in Florida where he taught religion and philosophy for three years before hearing of the opening at MC. He came to MC because he liked its location in the mountains, its size, the variety of classes he would be teaching, and the students and faculty. Overall, "I love it" said Hewitt.

His activities here include teaching classes of religion, theology, ethics, and philosophy, as well as coordinating activities for the campus ministry, since there is no full-time minister this year.

He would like to see the number of philosophy and religion majors grow and more students taking the classes as electives.

On a personal level, Hewitt likes to go hiking, refinish furniture, and work in his yard and garden. His idea of the perfect vacation would be "hiking in the mountains with good friends."

Two of his personal goals are "to be the best teacher I can possibly be," and to hopefully begin writing a book on one of his favorite subjects, contemporary theology.

Hewitt said to remember that professors "are really human." He wants students to be comfortable talking to him.

Graffiti is one sign that, while Carnegie Hall has been officially closed since 1982, it has not been completely empty.

Zap! Lazer Tag invades MC

by Jennifer C. Worth

Beeps and sirens echo in the half-darkened hallways, punctuated by brief glints of red and by flashing LEDs. Occasionally this fall, Maryville College has resembled the set of some sci-fi thriller.

The source of the futuristic special effects is in reality quite simple -- a game of tag. It's not just ordinary tag, however; the game of the hour is Lazer Tag by Worlds of Wonder, which adds a hi-tech twist to the game that reigned on elementary-school playgrounds.

Toy handguns, called "StarLytes," fire infrared beams at special receivers, called "StarSensors," which record "hits" and keep score. More elaborate equipment, from sensor-equipped helmets to rapid-fire rifles, is also available.

"It's lots of fun," noted junior Ellen Foreman, third-floor resident assistant of Lloyd Hall. Many other MC students share her opinion, judging from the number of Lazer Tag players on campus.

Lazer Tag has been on the market since 1986, but recent price reductions have reignited its popularity, especially among financially-straitened college students. A StarLyte and StarSensor with holster/belt initially cost about 30 dollars; area stores now sell the set for about 10 dollars.

The game's early popularity inspired a spinoff cartoon series, Lazer Tag Academy, set in the year 3010, in which the main characters can manipulate their StarLytes' energy to mystically alter space and travel through time.

The show, however, could not match the game's success. Why is Lazer Tag so popular?

Senior Kathy Fox, who has recently purchased her own Lazer Tag set, answered, "Because it's different. It adds a little bit of excitement to an otherwise pretty boring life."

Foreman said, "It's a great game," adding, "It's a great way to get rid of aggressions."

Sophomore Bill Householder, another fan of the game, pointed out that Lazer Tag, like other war games and chase games, feeds on a subconscious drive: "An instinct to hunt is in every person, and the 'human animal' is a much better opponent than ordinary prey."

But not everyone enjoys the game or enjoys being around while the game is played. Junior Andi Bristol, fourth-floor resident assistant of Copeland Hall, against Milligan, at 5:00 p.m., and Covenant, at 7:00 p.m. Saturday, the men's basketball team will hold an intersquad scrimmage in the middle gym from 9:00 to 11:00.

Other traditional events will include the Community Barbecue from 11:30 a.m. to 1:00 p.m. on the lawn between Thaw Hall and the HPER building.

MC will also host the annual Harvest Crafts Fair, in the HPER building. The fair, co-sponsored by the Blount County Alumni Chapter and the Maryville College Women's Club, will earn proceeds for scholarships for MC students.

Student Programming has added a new facet to the Dorm Decoration contest: a "Color War."

Whereas the traditional contest involves overall decoration of the dorms, usually related to the theme, the Color War assigns a specific color to each "army" (the five dorms and the commuters). This color may be used to supplement the dorm decorations, but it is a separate competition.

said of Lazer Tag, "It seems to be a way for people to relieve stress, but I have had some complaints pertaining to the noise that it creates."

Bristol added, however, "In Copeland lone of the chief arenas for Lazer Tag play, we have set down some pretty strict guidelines, and since they've gone into effect, things have been more peaceful."

These rules include a limit of 12 people playing at once, no yelling or running, and no playing during quiet hours (after visitation).

Lloyd's players follow similar guidelines, although they have not been formalized. Foreman said that players are "told to keep it reasonable," such as stopping the game when quiet hours begin. The chief rule, she said, is "Respect everybody."

The game's popularity may be decreasing, however. Bristol noted, "In the past week or so, enthusiasm seems to have dwindled." Mid-semester studies may have cut down on students' free time, and decreasing temperatures put a damper on outdoor games.

Bristol suggested one possible reason for flagging interest in Lazer Tag: "I guess the novelty is wearing off."

Foreman, however, has not noticed any appreciable decline in the game's campus popularity.

"Louella Titwell" (Rees Cramer) gives a Jackie O-style wave to woo the crowd as "she" competed in mock Homecoming "Queen" contest Saturday, October 15.

Rockumentary revives Lennon with style

by Bill Householder

In the shadow of Albert Goldman's recent slam book about John Lennon comes a new documentary on the "Walrus" celebrating his life and music.

Imagine John Lennon is a documentary that sheds light on the late Beatle's life, a life that was always under the microscope of the British and American press.

Using over 100 hours of interviews with Lennon intercut with recent and early interviews with Lennon's family and friends, Imagine explores the ups and downs of Lennon's life: from his stormy childhood, through the Beatles heyday and the infamous lost weekend, up to his tragic assassination on December 8, 1980.

For Lennon/Beatles fans, the film is powerful and beautiful, with clips from previous Beatles documentaries, newsreels, and home movies, as well as recent interviews with sons Julian and Sean, widow Yoko, and former wife Cynthia.

There are many interesting clips showing Lennon as the multi-faceted artist that he was. He is shown making music, meeting fans, being a father, and, in some pretty revealing clips, being a lover.

The music, remastered by the Beatles' own George Martin, was very well selected. Surprisingly, the title song was not used at the beginning, but at the end, along with the Beatles "In My Life."

The editing was equally well done, segueing moments in Lennon's life with interviews where he would discuss the moments in his life, almost as if he were actually narrating the film. This, of course, was the intention of Yoko and producer David Wolper to give the film a greater sense of Lennon's presence.

Imagine is one of the most effective of the number of rockumentaries over the years.

Overall, Imagine John Lennon is a good tribute to the "Walrus" as well as a treat for his fans, young and old.

Some Homecoming activities are aimed chiefly at visiting alumni, such as the meetings of the Alumni Board and the Alumni soccer game at 11 a.m. Saturday. Alumni will also be involved with the "Making Connections" video.

Sporting events are another centerpiece of Homecoming Weekend. Most eyes will be focused on Saturday's football game against Hampden-Sydney at 1:30. The team is hoping to follow up on last Saturday's 20-10 defeat of the University of the South (Sewanee).

The men's soccer team will face Oglethorpe at 4:00 p.m. Friday. The women's volleyball team will play back-to-back games

FAC displays women's exhibit

by Andi Bristol

This month, the FAC Gallery is featuring "Women Artists", a comprial of works by 23 local women artists.

According to to Art Major Shannon Jackson, Thelma Bianco, professor of Art, is responsible for this compilation.

Myrtle Bartolini's use of geometric patterns and folded paper is both unique and fascinating. But perhaps the most interesting medium is Marilyn Turner's collage of magazine clippings. She used magazines from the 1930's and 1940's, cutting the pictures with unbelievably fine detail.

Another artist using an interesting medium is Dot Galloway, who uses hand-made paper stretched over sea shells.

Among the numerous, water colors in the exhibit, Martha Jare McDowell's Paulette School is noteworthy. She uses various hues of earth colors to give it the look of an old-time photograph.

The best use of water colors, however is seen in Margaret Scanlon's work. In Meadow, she uses vibrant colors in a floral-like design.

In Cow Plate, she treats a totally different subject, placing a cow with fork and knife wounds on the center of a plate. Around the plate is written, "Yes, I was a vegetarian, but not anymore."

Also noteworthy are Adeline Perry's bronze sculptures -- especially the relief of her husband, John.

"Women Artists" will run until the end of October.

Varied media characterize the FAC Gallery's October exhibit, "Women Artists," which displays works by 23 local artists.

preparation, heavy telephone. We offer above average benefits. Reply to Ann Broyles P.O. Box 2390, Knoxville, Tn. 37933."

According to Webster's dictionary, "Progressive" means "1. a moving or going forward. 2. development. 3. advancement; improvement." Can a doctor's office be progressive? In what context is "loyal" used? Loyal to whom or what? Possibly with the fringe benefits? Fast pace? Who wants to visit a fast-paced doctor's office? Does this explain "progressive?"

And what of the "heavy telephone"? How heavy is it? Should applicants enter weight-training?

I asked about 20 people to explain what a progressive doctor's office was. I met with no success. Would you go to a progressive doctor's office not knowing what treatment to expect from the fast-paced, loyal, and energetic individual who could man-handle a heavy telephone, and who could also deal with the paid fringe benefits.

Finally, David Powell, adjunct English professor, who may or may not be progressive, came to my assistance. According to his definition, a "progressive" doctor's office refers to the attitude and the kind of treatment offered. This means that the doctor(s) in question will deal with something like AIDS or abortion. Well, I accepted this definition until I thought about the "paid fringe benefits."

I read on: "BUSY"

PROGRESSIVE 3-man dental practice in Lenoir City wants another fun, bright, energetic hygienist. Will pay $125 a day + paid benefit pkg. incl. health ins. & pension. Send resume to: Ann B., P.O. Box 23590, Knoxville 37933."

Based on Dr. Powell's definition of a "progressive doctor's office" how can a dental practice be progressive?

Concerning the word "fun": what could possibly be fun about a dental practice? Let's face it, everyone smiles sometimes, but has anyone ever met a "fun, bright, energetic hygienist"? Probably the one who gets $125 a day + incentive.

The definition started to fall apart until I read on: "ESTABLISHED"

PROGRESSIVE practice in Maryville. An immediate opening for doctor's asst., LPN or medical asst. desired. Taking histories in assisting in preparation, some front office duties. Looking for a fun, bright, energetic person who enjoys a fast pace. We offer above-average salary, paid fringe benefits & a great atmosphere. Send resume to: Attn. Ann, P.O. Box 23590, Knoxville, Tn 37933."

Once again there is a request for a "fun, bright, and energetic" person in a fast-paced "great atmosphere."

Consulting Webster again I found of the word "atmosphere": "1. the entire mass of air, made up of oxygen, nitrogen, and other gasses, surrounding the earth. 2. the gaseous envelopment surrounding any heavenly body. 3. the air in any locality. 4. any pervading influence; general mood or tone."

What is a "great atmosphere"? Considering that we accept the fourth definition, can the atmosphere be all that great from an "established progressive practice"? Once again consulting Webster, we find of the word "great": "1. very much larger, bigger, longer, etc. than the ordinary. 2. very much more intense, notable.... 3. most important; chief, principle. 4. older or younger by one generation. 5. skilled.... 6. superb; excellent. 7. pregnant."

Compiling and digesting all this information about doctor's practices or offices, a fast pace with a "very much more intense" "prevailing influence; general mood or tone" originating from an energetic, fun, and loyal person working in a progressive practice... forget it, it's too much for me.

Well what about a "established progressive practice"? Not only is this doctor's office still practicing (I guess they haven't gotten it right yet), it is progressive and established! Don't contradict each other? One would think that in this day and age with progressive being prevalent, doctors would need less practice! What's next, progressive car lots? Or maybe an established progressive political party? The sky is the limit, or should I say atmosphere? Who knows anymore?

For those of can't type or don't care to, here is an answer for our problem (or is it).

"NEED A Resume? 6 yrs. professional experience. General typing also 983-1921"

This may, at first, seem to be a normal, unobtrusive ad, but this person is advertising for work. In the first place this ad is misplaced in the "help-wanted" section instead of the "will work" section. A resume is a very important piece of paper for the upper-level jobs. This person claims to have "6 yrs." experience, but would you trust something as important as your resume to someone, who can't type one well enough to keep himself/herself from advertising in the paper for work under the wrong heading? I think not.

This may be progressive and written in a great atmosphere by a fun, energetic, bright, and loyal person, who may or may not be established, but still is practicing nonetheless. Yet the truth is that no one really knows what all this stuff means; some don't even care.

I have two observations: 1. I will always choose carefully all of my doctors. 2. these ads were taken from a daily paper that is printed only five of the seven days in a week! I progressively rest my established case!

Diplomas, from p. 1

In 1971, the last time more women than men graduated from high school, young black women aged 25 to 29 led black men 61 percent to 54 percent in high school graduates.

Last year, 85 percent of young black men and 82 percent of young black women finished high school.

Asians are the most educated racial group, Kominski said. Almost 79 percent finished high school and 33 percent graduated from college. Seventy-seven percent of whites graduated from high school and 21 percent finished college.

Sixty-three percent of blacks finished high school and 11 percent received college degrees, while 51 percent of Hispanics received high school diplomas and nine percent earned college degrees.

The West has the highest educational levels, with 80.6 percent high school graduates and 22.8 percent with college degrees.

The least educated region is the South, Kominski found, with 71 percent of its citizens holding high school diplomas and 18 percent college degrees.

Although today's Americans have more education than their ancestors, Kominski said that we're "not necessarily" smarter; "We all like to think that we were raised in the generation which is the best and the brightest."

Mann returns 'home' to join MC Music Dept.

by Charollette Borderieux

Margaret Mann is a Maryville College graduate who is glad to return as one of the new faces on the Maryville College campus, along with husband, Band Director and MACCO Conductor Paul Theissen.

Mann graduated in 1968 with a Bachelor of Arts, but she returned in 1969 to complete the courses she needed to obtain a music degree. She then attended Northwestern University and received a Master of Music degree.

She next began a career as a mezzo soprano soloist in Chicago. She was soon offered a year contract at the International Opera Studio in Zurich, Switzerland, then in the fall of 1978 she began work at Lauden Theater, Coburg, West Germany.

After singing in over 40 different productions with well over 500 performances, she was ready to come home.

"My husband and I had wanted to come back to America, and when I was honored to receive the Maryville College Alumni Citation in May of last year, I spoke to Dr. Ferrin about the music department," she said. "I then offered to help if they needed me, and that's how I got here."

This year Mann is doing public relations work as well as teaching a class called Elementary School Music. This class, for non-music majors, instructs them how to teach music to elementary-school students.

She is also planning to work with the students in theater who would like to perform a musical in the spring, and she plans to hold an opera workshop sometime in the near future.

Mann will be teaching an interim entitled "I See," which will focus on optical processes and observational skills. The course will explore such topics as why people who witness the same object or event say that they "see" different aspects of the same objects or events.

Mann and Theissen would also like to start a Fine Arts festival. The festival would last for two weeks and maybe later expand to six weeks. It would be open to anyone between the ages of 13 and 18 and perhaps some older people. The festival would include various fields, such as instrumental and chamber music, vocal-choral music, keyboards, ballet, theater, and concert work.

According to one of her students, Mann is a patient and understanding teacher. She and others in her class are looking forward to participating in many of the other activities she has planned.

Poll names Mickey, St. Francis for Pres.

(CPS) -- While expensive political consultants tried to guess if this was the year the "student vote" -- the huge body of voters that could swing national elections but, thanks to collegians' terrible turnout record, never has -- finally shows up, University of North Florida student reporter Declan Doyle decided to find out for himself.

In a "random survey" of 12 classmates, Doyle asked students to say whom they would like to see in the White House next January.

The winner: Chrysler Corp. Chairman Lee Iacocca, who got two votes. St. Francis of Assisi, Harry S. Truman, Teddy Roosevelt, Mickey Mouse, Whoppy Goldberg, and a "dead cat" each received one vote.

turned to the schools to locate applicants," explained J.C. Penney's Jo Maxwell, who added that she did so reluctantly because students generally are not available during her peak Christmas season.

Maxwell is not the only one. "There are increases every year" in the number of part-time job offers to students, said California State University - Long Beach placement official Tony Hodge.

"In New York," Bohman added, "the student population declined 21 percent between 1970 and 1980. There are just fewer college-age workers."

The competition for them has help push up wages and, in some places, left campuses themselves unable to find enough students to fill their own part-time positions.

The result has been long lines at cafeterias at the University of Maryland, where Food Services Director Matthew Sheriff complained last week that he still had 100 jobs he could not fill.

To win student workers back from higher-paying off-campus employers, Arizona State University raised minimum pay for some jobs to $4.02 per hour, from $3.61, and to $9.22 for some jobs, said student aid official Richard Cons. "The changes are

St. Dev. sets goals

by Lynn Smith

"Our main goal, theme, and emphasis is that we are trying build a community," said Sue Wyatt, vice president of Student Development.

The department is divided into two areas -- Life Enrichment and Campus Life. "This year we stabilized positions that were already held and made the program more solid," Wyatt said.

The department has also expanded to include the Campus Ministry as a part of Student Development. "There are about a dozen faculty, staff, and students trying to provide leadership through the FCA [Fellowship of Christian Athletes], BSU [Baptist Student Union], the Church and College Scholar Program, and three bible study groups," Wyatt said.

Director Campus Life, Leslie Nier heads student activities, housing, and programming. Under Nier's direction alum Sherrie O'Brien is now the head of Student Programming, and Sandra King, residence director of Pearsons, Davis, and Lloyd halls, is in charge of housing.

According to Wyatt, the department is concentrating on the Life Enrichment Center, because it touches so many areas. "We want to have a program that will tie into the academic classes and CIV," said Wyatt, so students can work on social, spiritual, emotional, and physical self-improvements.

The department also wants leadership on campus in doing so, they held a leadership work seminar on campus this year.

Wyatt believes that in order to create a sense of community, one first has to feel safe. Because of this belief, the department has recently developed a 24-hour emergency number, 977-7755. The number will put callers in touch with the Student Development Staff Member On Duty (SMOD), who will then contact Security.

When asked about future goals, Wyatt said that the department is going to spend time reviewing the student handbook, improving the level of activities and programs on campus, providing more services for the commuting students, and continuing to adjust to the larger number of students on campus this year.

Part-time jobs market booms for students

by J.M. Rubin

(CPS) -- The part-time job market for college students is booming this fall, placement specialists have reported in recent weeks.

Job boards at schools as varied as Kirkwood Community College in Iowa, Miami-Dade Community College, Mississippi State and California State-San Jose Universities, Franklin and Marshall College, and the Universities of Maryland and Miami reportedly remain full of listings for students who, now avidly wooed, sometimes find themselves weighing competing offers.

Nationwide, "College students should be able to find plenty of part-time and entry-level full-time jobs," said Vicky Bohman of Manpower, Inc., the New York-based temporary employment agency which released a survey of such jobs the last week of September.

Bohman and other observers thank several trends for the boom.

She cited a decline in the number of young people nationwide -- creating a labor shortage for firms that have always hired college-aged workers -- and even some corporate uncertainty about causes of the job market boom.

"As the [economic] outlook improves," Bohman said, "the employer may be unwilling to add permanent employees but may be able to hire workers on a temporary basis to see if a job is really needed."

Jane Miller, a jobs administrator at Michigan State University, agreed that some companies like to "test drive" a job by filling it with a student.

Other firms are wooing students more for demographic reasons.

Evans scores for Scots

by Bill Householder

The MC men's soccer team, 9-4, is looking good this year. They're already 9-4 for the season and ranked seventh in the Southern Division and one reason they're doing so well is junior forward Randy Evans.

Last year Evans broke the school record with 13 goals and five assists, becoming MC's all-time leading scorer in soccer. He has continued to improve his total to 22 goals. "He's broken every scoring record that there is at this school: career, season, and game," Head Soccer Coach Phil Neddo said.

In Tuesday's game against Carson-Newman, Evans scored a record five goals of the Scots' seven; only one of these was a penalty kick.

Originally from Franklin, Tennessee, Evans was a highly recruited high school athlete, making Parade Magazine's High School All-American soccer team, who first went to Tennessee-Wesleyan before transferring to MC his sophomore year.

"When I knew the [soccer] program at Wesleyan was going to fall, I decided to look for somewhere else to go," Evans said.

Even though he wanted to go to a larger Division I school, he changed his mind after talking with Neddo and assistant coach Bakty Barber. Evans said, "I figured that I could learn just as much here and as well and still have the small school atmosphere that I enjoy. I went to a small high school and I liked it."

"I was really impressed with Coach Neddo and Bakty, Coach Neddo for his tremendous tactical ability and Bakty for his tremendous technical ability," he added.

However, MC almost didn't get him because the week Evans came up to visit MC his car caught on fire in front of Coach Neddo's house, and since he couldn't get it towed, Evans decided to stay at MC for three years. "He has never been the same since," said Neddo.

But athletics alone isn't what drew Evans to MC. "I was very impressed with the academic standards here at Maryville, I was an honor student in high school, and at Wesleyan I just wasn't challenged."

Even after enrolling, Evans was not sure whether he would stay at MC. "To be honest, when I first came here I didn't know if it was going to be just for one year and then for me to move on to a bigger Division I school to play...but the year I spent I knew I could do just as well. The coaches here had the ability to increase my knowledge of the game and to increase my ability," Evans said.

Evans was the only player from the under-23 all-Tennessee team to be selected for the South Regional Olympic Team. Neddo pointed out that, at 19, Evans will have more chances to compete.

Evans started playing soccer when he was eight years old and has played almost every sport an athlete can play: baseball, football, and basketball, but he says that soccer is the sport he enjoys the most.

"It's the most challenging sport I've played, because not only do you have to be smart to play the game and to do well at it. It's a lot of anticipating and knowing what you're going to do before the situation happens. Nothing is set for you; you create your own plays [during the game]. It's your own creativity, and that part of the game is really challenging is really, and that's something I really liked about it," he said.

Evans was named NCL South Player of the year 1987 and was named a candidate to the Academic All-American team by the Intercollegiate Soccer Association of America October 11. "Which means," Neddo said, "Randy is also an outstanding student, not only in academics but [also in] athletic ability. [He] has got very balanced college experience [and] can master academics while being a strong asset to this team."

"I want my players to have success in all areas, without one affecting the other. Randy is a perfect example. It's one thing to be balanced in these things, but Randy excels. It just blows my mind," Neddo added.

Fellow soccer player Chris Varner said of Evans, "Randy leads by example. He doesn't say much; he's not a cheerleader, but he encourages. Speaking from a

Lady Scots 'work hard,' return to varsity soccer

by Yvonne Cosentino

Women's soccer has returned this year as a varsity sport.

With only six unexperienced players, the Lady Scots, coached by Jerry Litton have worked hard for their 2-8-1 record.

Their best game was their 5-4 win over Liberty University in overtime. "Our second-best game would have to be our 2-3 loss to Emory in overtime," Erskine, ranked second in the NAIA division, and the University of North Carolina at Greensboro, ranked fourth in the nation in Division II, have been Maryville's toughest opponents, giving the Lady Scots the experience they need to prepare for next season.

Phil Neddo, men's soccer coach and MC soccer director, and Litton have already begun recruiting for next year. Their goals for the next couple of years include bringing in 10 to 15 quality freshman and/or transfers. They also aspire to make the playoffs. Litton feels this can be accomplished, using Maryville's men's soccer team as an example.

As for this year, learning the fundamentals is the most important goal, since the majority of the players are playing on their first college team. Captain Denise Amann is the leading assist player with four assists. Co-captain Betsy Crews set the third all-time NCAA record for the most saves in a single game with 42 saves. Both have scored four goals apiece. Kelly Smelser is the leading scorer for the Scots with five goals.

The backbone of the team's defense has been players Marilyn McCoy and Keri Terwedow. "They don't give up," said Litton. "The team still plays just as hard in the end as they did in the beginning."

Freshman Amanda Krenning summed up the team's attitude: "We work hard."

working." Cons reported.

They haven't worked everywhere. Just three weeks into the year, Iowa State University ran out of work-study funds because it had to cure an on-campus labor shortage by raising work-study pay by 20 percent, ISU administrator Janie Barnett said.

The university of New Mexico, moreover, had to cut 200 on-campus work-study jobs because it had to pay students more to compete with off-campus job offers.

Kent State University work-study officials, meanwhile, did not raise wages, and reported that they can't fill their on-campus jobs that pay more.

"Many of the country's major employers -- Anheuser-Busch, Monsanto, McDonnell Douglas -- are located in the St. Louis area," Whitted said. "Employment opportunities with these companies are increasing."

"Major" employers trolling the Michigan State campus for students to hire also sometimes bring on students full-time after graduation, MSU's Miller added.

Whatever the job, however, everyone seems to want to hire a student this fall.

Even Ann Thompson, herself a Cal. State-Long Beach senior who recently started a secretarial service, wants to hire college students to work with her. "College students," she said, "are glad for a job that accommodates their schedule. They may take less pay [for a flexible job] than another worker."

goal-keeper's point of view, he scares me to death, because he's a thinking-man's player; [he] is physically talented enough to put into action the complex plans he dreams up."

Varner added that Evans is "one of those people you like to see or enjoy seeing succeed, because you like him. Randy Evans will succeed...the reason for this isn't his intelligence, physical talents, or looks. It's because he truly cares for people."

"I like to think of myself, both on and off the field...as a leader and a follower, as a teacher and most important as a student, both of the game and of life. I look to see what I can do to help a teammate and I'm always looking to see what I can get from them to help myself. I guess that sums up my philosophy," Evans said.

Would you want to live here? The Peace Education Task Force constructed this shanty on October 30 to alert the campus to the plight of the homeless. Jennifer C. Worth

Shanty displays homeless plight

by Bill Householder

In order for people to become more aware of the plight of the homeless situation, the Peace Education Task Force (PETF) built a homeless shelter next to the CCM October 30. The plight of the homeless does not solely affect them; it also affects those of us who live in warm dorms, houses, apartments, or condominiums.

At least, it should affect us. Many seem to think that the homeless problem is someone else's problem in some other city, certainly not in their hometown or the hometown of their school.

But the fact remains that about three million people are homeless in the United States. In Knoxville, the rescue missions see about 600 homeless a week. There are approximately 5,000 homeless in Knoxville; that's three percent of the 160,000 people who live in the city. No matter where you go in this country, the homeless will be there.

The shanty represents the type of conditions the homeless have to endure throughout the year. It is made out of cardboard, plastic and wooden stakes, the homeless use similar materials to build their shelters. Posters on all sides of the shelter provide information, and slogans and catch-phrases are intended to get people's attention. Signs read, "We can't be secure while some go hungry" and "How can we be prosperous while 3 million are homeless?" "No one should live like this!" and "Homes not bombs" are among the statements written on the shanty.

Over the weekend three freshmen stayed in the shanty in support of the ## Student Senate debates resolution

by Lissa McLeod

The Student Senate debated the year's first resolution October 27. Other topics of discussion included campus governance, Pearson's representation, and the alcohol task force's "listening sessions."

Resolution SS-1, written by Jon Allison, requests that the physical plant submit a status report of all athletic playing fields by November 1988. This resolution is being sent to the physical plant office.

The reasoning behind this resolution involves a concern for equal and adequate playing fields for all Maryville College athletes. Allison said that the bill was written in part as a response to the women's soccer team's petition, (see related story, page 7).

The Student Senate decided that the All College Council (ACC), should establish a committee to review the procedure of campus governance, at their November 3 meeting. The senate decided that the ACC should make this committee, rather than the Student Senate, to insure faculty and staff input, as well as student input.

The Student Senate

amended its constitution to include one representative from Pearson Hall to serve in Student Senate. Pearson, housing senior women, was reinstated this year as a residence hall. Also adopted was a statement providing for one student senator from each new residence hall as the college expands in the future.

An amendment to the constitution requires a two-thirds vote of student senators in two consecutive meetings; to get the matter resolved before the November 3 ACC meeting to guarantee more rapid implementation, Allison called a special meeting of senators immediately following the regular one for the purpose of amending the constitution. The bill passed in both votes.

If the ACC also approves this measure, a student senator will be chosen from Pearson Hall within two weeks.

Student members of the ACC who met with the Board on October 24 said that most of the conversation centered on the alcohol issue. There was concern raised at the Student Senate meeting that the listening sessions scheduled by the Alcohol Task Force are just a technicality and will not really give a voice to student concerns.

Both Tina Stanley, faculty advisor to the Student Senate, and Allison, Student Senate president, stressed that they felt that students would be heard at these sessions and should attend at least one session.

The Alcohol Task Force will be at the next Student Senate Meeting, November 10, 12:30 p.m., in the CCM to listen to students' suggestions and concerns. Other listening sessions include Wednesday, November 9, at 9 p.m. in Lloyd lobby for freshmen and seniors, and Thursday, November 10, at 9 p.m. in Lloyd lobby for sophomores and juniors.

The dates for remaining Student Senate meetings this semester are November 10, December 1, and December 8. All meetings are open to any student and begin at 12:30 p.m. in the CCM.

Students comment on '88 campaign

by Andi Bristol

MC students, like the rest of the nation, are wondering exactly what has hit them when it comes to all of the hoopla of the 1988 presidential campaigns.

Freshman John T. Worth said of the media's involvement, "I feel that the media is getting a little carried away digging into their [the candidates'] personal lives. It's nobody's business!" He then added of the Gary Hart scandal, "Just because a man sleeps with a woman besides his wife, doesn't mean that he would be a bad president."

For the most part, students were not at all pleased with the way either the Dukakis or the Bush campaign has been run.

"My basic overall view is that they [the candidates] have avoided the issues and resorted to petty tactics and negative advertising while avoiding significant issues like the homeless, defense, etc," said Jennifer Greenwalt, a senior.

Freshman Sarah Kittrell had this to say about the candidates and their campaigns: "I think that there's been a lot more mudslinging than usual. I think they could have been a lot more mature about it."

Many felt that the major problem with this

Dull campaign: we asked for it

With less than a week until the day when we elect our next President, the tension ought to be so thick you could cut it with a knife.

It isn't.

We ought to feel a sense of building momentum, of hurtling toward a decision that will shape a nation's future for the next four years.

It's just not there.

What has happened to the American political machine? Why do the voters face, yet again, a choice between two boring options? Why does the political parody song "I'm Worried, They're Sappy" ring so true?

There has been little in the course of the campaign to inspire us. We've seen George Bush visit a flag factory; we've seen Mike Dukakis riding a tank. We've heard the soundbites: "I want a kinder, gentler nation" and "They're trying to sell you a package. Wouldn't you rather have a president?"

These symbols and slogans are established, perhaps even unavoidable elements of American politics. As the pre-broadcast-era orators knew, emotional appeal can be a valuable tool.

But emotional appeal without a pragmatic stance is hollow. Emotional appeal sparks interest. Perhaps that accounts for the snowballing apathy that has characterized American voters, especially among the young, for years.

When a reporter, gathering sources for a story on an imminent presidential election, is swamped with nearly identical comments -- "I don't care," "They both stink," "It doesn't matter" -- then it's time to reevaluate the way political campaigns operate. College campuses have traditionally been seats of political zeal on the part of students as well as faculty and staff.

So why haven't the candidates inspired us?

Obviously, they have stressed symbol over substance, the pleasing over the realistic, the moderate over the fiery. They have attacked each other's values while extolling their own.

Shame on them.

But on second thought, they're only giving us what we think we want, what we seem to ask of them. Like the advertisers who use sex to sell perfume, the candidates and their campaign managers are simply trying to pull the right emotional strings. And we are letting them, even encouraging them.

We have no right to complain about our slim pickings for Chief Executive, because we created the political atmosphere that, in turn, created the fortunes of the '88 campaign. When we stop asking for the status quo wrapped up in a quiet-spoken middle-to-upper-class package, we'll stop having to choose between a George Bush and a Michael Dukakis.

Shame on the politicians? No, shame on us.

According to the latest statistics, over three million people in this country are homeless. That means that the trend toward being homeless is rising and the sooner it catches on, the more homeless this country will become, until we're no longer known as the land of the free and the home of the brave but the land of the freezing and the homeless, but still brave.

More and more "Amurricans" are rushing out to every Goodwill store and buying last decades fashions for pennies a pound. The rescue missions are noting a marked increase in people wearing nouveau-homeless fashions, from coats of many colors to the worst of cardboard and newspaper.

One mission, in fact, stated that with the increase in the nouveau-homeless, a nearby office complex may have to be destroyed in order to build a brand-new high-rise tenement, complete with reject lab rats, to better serve them.

"These days we're seeing a huge increase in the number of homeless 'wannabe's' -- lawyers, doctors, pharmacists, and politicians. Especially politicians. They think the homeless are a good role model for today's youth. One candidate went so far as to rename his campaign: 'Homeless R Us in '88,' said Silence Dogood III, a noted speaker on matters of public opinion.

One politician suggested a sensible way to solve overcrowding in prisons: "Let the inmates out, furnish them with the best cardboard we have to offer, and let 'em be homeless!" said Stan Jayle, a bush-league Hoosier.

Many Jayle detractors stated that if Jayle's suggestion was put into practice, it would be like giving criminals a slap on the wrist. "Criminals should stay in jail where they belong; "Amurrica" belongs to the homeless!" said presidential hopeful, Mitchell Bushwhacker.

Many groups are protesting this trend into homelessness, favoring a return to the era of a self-involved attitude in the nation. However, the protesters' pleas fall on deaf ears as many "Amurricans" choose to support the nouveau-homeless.

To try and combat this support, protesters will hold another rally in Washington, D.C., this week, in an effort to lower people's consciousness toward the nouveau-homeless and bring the nation back to self-involvement.

Regardless of the protesters, nouveau-homelessness remains a strong trend in the nation. We, as concerned "Amurricans", should do everything we can to help further and support the nouveau-homeless cause.

So trade in your Chryslers and Nissans, your Westinghouse and GE appliances, your Yves St. Laurents and Pierre Cardins, your Reeboks and Aigners, and your "Polo" and "Passion" for Kmart "blue-light" specials, Salvation Army castoffs, and Goodwill bargains.

Be one of us; be homeless!

Memorandum mixes comedy, comment

by Jennifer C. Worth

"It's a combination of Monty Python and George Orwell."

That is how cast member Bill Householder described The Memorandum, Maryville College Theatre's upcoming fall production, set to open November 17. The play combines a madcap farce atmosphere with sobering commentary on the uncontrollable social and bureaucratic forces that rule our lives.

Director Frank Bradley said of The Memorandum, "It should be one long, breathless whirl, and I hope the audience will feel that."

As the production enters the final stage of rehearsals, the cast and crew faces ever more pressing time and energy demands.

Assistant Stage Manager Mike Goodrich said, "We work hard."

Bradley noted, "This is the most serious working stage." He added, "Once we get over the hump and starting putting the different elements together, it will really be fun."

At this point, The Memorandum is a collection of diverse elements, each of which is developing separately. "This is the most compartmentalized play I've ever produced. It's really four separate parts," Bradley said.

The most obvious element is the central plotline, or, as Bradley described it, "the play that [playwright Vaclav] Havel wrote."

The plot follows the bureaucratic processes as an election has been that the candidates have been avoiding the issues.

"In my personal opinion they're not addressing the issues because neither of them know what they [the issues] are," said Jim Rice, freshman political science major.

Senior Angela Delozier had this to add: "I only wish that there was someone I wanted to vote for. I don't like either one of them."

Freshman J.P. Johnson agreed saying, "It's pathetic! Neither one of the candidates is worth voting for."

artificial language -- Ptydepe -- is introduced into a government department (adapted from Havel's original setting of a corporation). Ptydepe is intended "to make office communications more precise and introduce precision and order into their terminology."

Mr. Gross, a self-proclaimed humanist supporting "natural human speech," discovers that Ptydepe is also a vehicle for office politics and a means for his deputy director, Jane Ballas (played by Jennifer C. Worth), to more firmly wield office power.

A second element of The Memorandum is the subplot concerning Miss Lear, played by Liz Prior, and her Ptydepe classes.

Bradley said of Prior's work so far, "She's doing some really neat work with those scenes"; he added that she delivers Miss Lear's lectures as "almost an operatic Julia Child."

A third element is the set changes, which Bradley has expanded into a subplot in their own right.

The play's fourth component is the music, which Bradley has begun to select. Like the pace of the play itself, the music will be "fast-paced, frenetic," Bradley said. He plans to use "very mechanical, alienating, machine-like rock music," which will emphasize the alienation and automatization at the center of the play.

Bradley is very excited about this facet of the production, saying, "When it does come together, it's going see Memo, p.8

Most others who were questioned had similar, if not identical, responses. An atmosphere of disillusionment and apathy prevailed.

Amidst all of this indecision and complaints there was finally someone who had an opinion on the candidates themselves, "I think that leaving what's left of the Reagan administration in there is like letting Jim and Tammy back into the PTL," said Michelle Rudisill, a sophomore.

Whatever the outcome on Tuesday, November 8, one thing is clear: MC students are not in the least bit happy about the way this campaign has been run.

"The Party Boys" supplied lights and sound for the Homecoming Dance, October 22.

Oak Ridge concert set

Is there a special significance to the inclusion of a composer's name in the title of a chamber music group?

In the case of the Kodaly Quartet, the answer is definitely "yes." The right to name their group after Zoltan Kodaly, the famous Hungarian composer and teacher, was granted them as a result of the musical reputation in Hungary and the interest and support of Mme. Kodaly, the composer's widow.

The quartet was founded in the early 1960s by four prize-winning graduates of the Franz Liszt Academy in Budapest. International recognition soon followed, with the award of a special diploma at the Geneva Competition in 1966 and first prize at the Wiener International Competition in Budapest two years later. In 1970 they were decorated by the Hungarian government, and in the same year were authorized to adopt the name "Kodaly" in their title.

While the group features performances of Kodaly and other prominent Eastern European artists, including Bartok and Dohnanyi, they also regularly perform a wide selection of other works from the standard string quartet repertoire.

The Quartet will hold a concert in Oak Ridge on November 12 at 8:15 p.m., at the Museum of Science and Energy. The program will include Haydn's D Minor Quartet, Op. 76, No. 2; Beethoven's Quartet in F, Op. 18, No. 1; and Bartok's Quartet No. 1 in A Minor, Op. 7.

problem and the enormity of the pain it is causing.

Anyone interested in going should contact Steve Ledman, Box 2259, for more information.

This Tuesday, Ann Brunger, coordinator of campus ministry, will hold a special chapel service out at the shanty, in honor of the homeless.

"This should be a trip we'll remember the rest of our lives. Our stand for the right of every American to an affordable home will surely send a message to the next president he'll not be able to consciously ignore," said Ledman.

Bush, Dukakis stress values, clash on issues

by Jennifer C. Worth

Bush vs. Dukakis: the day to decide between them is approaching.

Both candidates have stressed values -- patriotism, personal commitment, etc. -- over issues, although Dukakis has come closer to addressing specific programs and policies. Bush's 32-million-dollar TV ad campaign, however, has done a better job of emotionally connecting with the public.

While agreeing that deficit reduction is a top economic priority, the candidates split on how to go about it. Bush has proposed a "flexible freeze" on government spending; Dukakis wants to improve tax enforcement to eliminate waste. Neither wants to raise taxes, but Dukakis has not ruled out this option as a last resort.

The two differ on social issues. Dukakis favors federal assistance for child care programs and more low-cost housing. Bush opposes these measures.

Bush favors a constitutional amendment overturning Roe vs. Wade, the landmark Supreme Court decision leading to legalization of abortion. Dukakis, on the other hand, supports legalized abortion. He also would like to see the Equal Rights Amendment pass; Bush would not.

The candidates agree, in principle, in the areas of improving education and protecting the environment. Both, for instance, support increased federal student loans, but Dukakis favors more direct student aid.

As to the environment, Dukakis has outlined more specific goals than has Bush, such as reducing by 12 million tons the sulfur dioxide emissions, which are believed to cause or exacerbate acid rain. Both want to ban ocean dumping by 1991; in addition, Dukakis favors renewal of the Clean Water Act, vetoed by President Reagan.

The most controversial domestic issues of the campaign are crime and law enforcement. Bush has charged Dukakis with being "soft on crime," attacking Massachusetts' furlough program, which, under certain circumstances, gave prison inmates, including capital offenders such as first-degree murderers, weekend passes from jail. On one such furlough, convicted murderer Willie Horton raped and murdered a girl.

Dukakis has answered this charge by pointing out that 36 states allow furloughs to prisoners serving life-sentences. In 1969, Reagan, then governor of California, signed into law a bill allowing furloughs to first-degree murderers (he later rescinded the law due to public criticism). After the Horton incident, Dukakis signed a law banning furloughs for first-degree murderers.

On related issues, Bush opposes gun control and favors the death penalty; he believes the sentence should be given to drug traffickers. Dukakis takes the opposite stance, favoring gun control and opposing capital punishment.

The candidates differ most widely on the topics of foreign policy and defense. Dukakis decries such Reagan-administration moves as the Grenada invasion and the bombing of Libya. He strongly opposes U.S. aid to Central America contras and the expansion of America's naval presence in the Persian Gulf; Bush supports both policies.

Bush supports the Reagan administration's defense programs: "Star Wars" (Strategic Defense Initiative, a satellite system intended to destroy incoming nuclear missiles), the B-1 bomber, and the MX and Midgetman missile systems. Dukakis opposes these systems; however, he favors increased funding for conventional forces.

Vice-presidential candidates: have they affected the race?

by Charlotte Borderieux

While the presidential candidates are slinging mud at each other the vice-presidential candidates are trying to dig their way out of the muck.

The vice-presidential candidates are getting overshadowed by the aggressive campaigning that has dominated this year in the presidential race. Some people are not even aware of who these candidates are; the names Quayle and Bentsen mean nothing to them.

Opinions vary when it comes to which of the two candidates is the better choice for vice-president. Some are all for Bentsen; for example, Wendy Layne, a freshman at Maryville College, said, "I think Dan Quayle is a total geek. I don't think he's qualified to be president of the United States. It's really scary to think 'President Quayle.' Oh my God! I'll move to Australia."

Others are Republican right down to their boxer shorts. Freshman Mike Moore said, "Lloyd Bentsen appears weak; he doesn't have the presence that most people look for in a vice-presidential candidate. Lloyd Bentsen is a terrible public speaker; he's not sure where he stands on most issues. All he is, basically, is a sounding board for Michael Dukakis. Whatever Dukakis says, Bentsen agrees with right down the line. I'm going to vote Republican."

Senator Dan Quayle is the running mate of Vice-President George Bush, and Senator Lloyd Bentsen is the running mate of Governor Michael Dukakis, but this is not usually enough for voters to decide which candidate they would like to see in office. In order to decide this one must know a little about the candidates themselves.

Quayle is a 41-year-old Republican from Indiana. Quayle was chosen, according to some Republicans, partly because he has the right-wing credentials that Bush lacks and also because he is young.

The Republicans are hoping to capture the younger generation with this apparently kind, lovable, and good-looking senator. This strategy has worked in some cases. For example, one Maryville student, when

Election commentary: Use right to vote

by Andi Bristol

On Tuesday, November 8, everybody in this country over the age of 18 will be able to exercise the right to vote.

That includes the majority of us MC students (excluding those who are under 18 or who are not U.S. citizens). Most of us fall into the 18- to 25-year-old category, which has the lowest percentage of registered voters who actually vote.

Why should college students be on the bottom of this scale when we are supposedly well-educated at this young age? I realize that most college students are away from home and that absentee ballots can be a hassle, but consider the alternative -- not voting at all.

How many times have we heard (or said), "I am not going to vote because my one vote isn't going to make a big difference, right?" Wrong! One vote does make a difference. What if everyone felt that his vote didn't matter? The only people who would then vote would be those who stood to make personal gains through a connection with one of the candidates. We would no longer have a representative democracy but, instead, an oligarchy.

There are countries in Europe that require their citizens to vote, because they aim toward having a true representation of what the populace wants.

In other countries, people are fighting bloody battles for the right to vote, while so many people in the United States take this right for granted and don't utilize it.

Let's all be thankful that the right to vote in this country exists and that it is not a case of if-you-don't-use-it-you-lose-it!

If you haven't already registered to vote, either by absentee ballot in your home district or in person in this district, then it is too late for you to vote in the upcoming election, but it is not too early to register for the next.

Political sentiments ran high during vice-presidential candidate Dan Quayle's visit to Knoxville's Market Square in September.

Nov. 8: 'soap opera' concludes

by Missy Pankake

The 1988 presidential campaign has assembled a soap opera plot.

Candidates have been hard-pressed to get and keep their acts together while overcoming major crises like lack of funds, scandals, and the media coverage.

Gary Hart was clearly the leading Democratic candidate, until the media went wild over his alleged indiscretions with model Donna Rice. Overwhelmed by the bad publicity, Hart dropped out of the race in 1987, striking a real blow to the Democratic Party. Hart re-entered the race seven months later, but it was too late to regain his momentum.

Then there was Democratic candidate Joseph Biden, who became a disgrace to the party when he was caught plagiarizing the speeches of Abraham Lincoln and John F. Kennedy, among others. The Dukakis campaign blew the whistle on Biden, causing bad feelings within the party.

Aside from the usual racial slurs, attacks, and innuendoes from both sides, Jesse Jackson's campaign did extremely well, surprising many observers. However, Jackson did not have enough support to capture the party's nomination, and he was deemed too controversial to be chosen as the vice-presidential contender.

Other Democrats, such as Bruce Babbitt, Albert Gore, and Paul Simon, were only minor characters in the plot of this election. Richard Gephardt was a frontrunner early in the primary season, but his popularity did not last.

On the Republican scene, the campaign of TV evangelist Pat Robertson caused quite a stir. Some of his policies would have totally combined church and state. The majority of the Republicans were not thrilled at this prospect, so Robertson's campaign did not go very far. He also made unfounded claims about Cuba's missile stockpile, further hurting his credibility.

Jack Kemp started out well, but he relied too heavily on playing up his all-American quarterback image instead of cultivating solid support. Ultimately, lack of funds ended his campaign.

George Bush maintained steady support, but his campaign was dogged by his "wimp" image and by the controversy over the Iran-Contra scandal.

Robert Dole was definitely doing well until his campaign got into a rut of attacking Bush. Voters tended to disagree with this strategy, and Dole's campaign fizzled out.

By convention time, the cast had narrowed to just two leading men: Bush and Dukakis.

Dan Quayle, Bush's choice for the Republican vice-presidential candidate, has hurt Bush's campaign more than any other factor in the past few months. Quayle is young, good-looking, personable, and allegedly a draft-dodger.

Military service is generally favorably looked upon as one of a politician's qualifications; the other candidates point with pride to military records. The charge of draft-dodging is a serious blot on Quayle's credentials.

Dukakis has been put on the defensive, fielding charges ranging from his height to his handling of problems in his state, Massachusetts.

As governor, Dukakis allowed weekend furloughs for prisoners, with tragic results. While he professes to be an environmentalist, Boston Harbor remains one of the most-polluted harbors in the U.S. These have been focal issues noted by the Bush campaign.

Dukakis' running mate, Lloyd Bentsen, has received little public attention; his credentials have not evoked close scrutiny.

So those are the choices in 1988. The final, climactic episode of the soap opera, "Presidential Campaign '88," airs Tuesday, November 8. Stay tuned!

The candidates: Dukakis faces issues

by Jim Rice

The presidential race has been winding up for its final swing, and now we, the people, have the difficult decision of whom to vote for. Berke Breathed had Opus in "Bloom County" trying to make the same decision, namely "Wimp or Shrimp."

Throughout the campaign, one candidate, Michael S. Dukakis, has addressed the issues. The other, George Bush, has merely relied on party platforms and tired rhetoric to win him the White House.

Bush has been running commercials discussing how Dukakis raised taxes to huge levels in Massachusetts. "And now he wants to do this to the whole country," the ads say.

To use an overused cliché, let's look at the record.

Bush has been crowing about how the present administration, of which he is a part, has lowered income taxes. Yes, this is true. What he doesn't say is that since 1980, Social Security taxes have risen so that the average American loses more to the government than at any time in history.

Dukakis has raised taxes, but not on the level that Bush would like for us to think. He used this economic measure because his state budget lost federal money that it had received under previous administrations.

Bush has said next to nothing about the Social Security issue, probably because there is nothing good to say. The Administration has raised the Social Security tax quite a bit. Because of this, most people would assume that more money is going to the elderly.

Wrong! Since 1980,

the people on Social Security are actually receiving less, because of delayed cost-of-living adjustments.

The Dukakis campaign has had problems with the questions about Dukakis' patriotism and charges that he is "soft on crime."

The patriotism issue referred to his veto of a law saying that all Massachusetts schoolchildren must say the Pledge of Allegiance before class every day. The veto was in accordance with the advice of the State Attorney General, who said that the law was unconstitutional and would probably be struck down by the state Supreme Court.

The accusation that he is "soft on crime" is due to the state's prisoner furlough program. What Bush doesn't mention is that this program began under the previous governor, who was a Republican.

When Bush and Reagan took office, the national debt was around $600 billion. They entered office saying that they would balance the budget in three years. The administration then proceeded to set record budget deficits, and now we have a national debt of approximately $2.5 trillion ($2,500,000,000,000). What's wrong with this picture?

It is possible for a person to go on and on over a subject like this, but the bottom line stands clear. Dukakis may not be the most likeable candidate, but likability is not a factor in deciding on the best president.

Political satirist Mark Russell has said, "If you want a friend, get a dog." If you want a president, vote for Michael S. Dukakis, on November 8.

Bush has experience

by Rees Cramer

In less than a week our country will choose the man who will be our next president. Whether you choose George Bush, Michael Dukakis, or Lyndon La Rouché, you will be making a decision that will affect your life for the next four to eight years and maybe the rest of your life.

In these turbulent times a president should be a strong individual with a good background in national government. Of the two major party candidates, only one has this ever so important credential — George Bush.

Bush's record as a public servant is impressive. From congressman to U.N. ambassador to CIA director, he has served his country with everything he has.

My goal is not to tell you whom to vote for but to give you a reason to think about voting for George Bush.

Homecoming Weekend

Lady Scots seek better field

by Lissa McLeod

The women's soccer team has requested better facilities. On October 19, 1988, the Maryville College women's varsity soccer team presented copies of a petition with over 300 student signatures to Phil Neddo, director of soccer programs; Randy Lambert, director of athletics; Phil Wilks, head football coach; and Richard Ferrin, president. The petition requested that the women be allowed to play their homecoming game on the stadium field that Friday, October 21, for the following reasons:

it is a varsity sport, and the team should have the privilege of playing on a decent field;

the men's soccer team is allowed to play on Honaker;

Honaker is a better field, therefore there is less possibility of sustaining injury;

it is more convenient and comfortable for the fans, who can sit on bleachers instead of on the ground;

it is a better reflection of the school and the athletic department and leaves a good impression on the alumni and other guests;

it is more beneficial in recruiting efforts to have the Lady Scots play on a good field; it enhances good rapport between the Lady Scots and other teams; and finally, it is more efficient: balls out of bounds will not have to be chased down hills, which results in loss of time.

The request was denied. One of the women said, "They didn't give us a definite 'no' but said if we pushed the matter further it might hurt the whole soccer program -- men's and women's."

This particular incident defines a conflict within the athletic department which catches the women's soccer program in the middle. At the end of last year, Neddo demanded that his team (men's soccer) be allowed to play in the stadium if the present field "went bad" during the season. The soccer field was not worked over and became neglected due to a change in the maintenance staff and therefore has large rocks that continue to surface in the field.

Neddo said that teams such as Oglethorpe, Emory, and Eastern Mennonite College have refused to play on that field again. The practice field is also in this shape. Neddo delivered an ultimatum that the men play on the stadium field or he would quit, despite several winning seasons. Lambert has said that he knows nothing of such an ultimatum.

Neddo, Lambert, and Wilks achieved a compromise in August of this year. It was agreed that the men's soccer team would play on the stadium field as long as there were two days between a soccer game and a football game. Lambert said that since a schedule had not been developed for the women's team at that point, they were not included in the discussion.

Regarding the old field, Neddo claims that a new field has been promised to the soccer program for two years and that his team has offered to do some of the necessary work for free, but the maintenance crew would not give them the necessary equipment and materials. Neddo charged, "If they put the same amount of effort on our field as the football practice field, we'd have a good field."

Lambert said, "We had hoped to have [the soccer field] ready this year." The first step toward repair, getting water down to the fields, has happened. Lambert said that a sand/topsoil mixture must now be added.

Part of the concern over the use of the stadium field is that it might not be able to support both the soccer program and the football program. There is concern that overuse would destroy the field. Neddo has noted that studies done at the University of Tennessee and the University of South Carolina prove that when soccer programs play on a field it actually helps the field by irrigating it.

The question is how much of the field should be used. Neddo claimed that if the field is used only for games, soccer and football, then there would be no danger to the field. Lambert agreed, saying, "I think we could come to a happy medium, although it will take coordination of scheduling six to eight months in advance."

The particular games in question on Friday, October 21 (men's and women's soccer) and Saturday, October 22

(football) were decided on the basis of the previous agreement. The men's soccer game was already scheduled before the football game, so they were allowed to play on the field Friday. The women's request was denied because, in Neddo's words, "I think it might hurt the girls more that it would help [them]."

Lambert said that given predictions of rain for the weekend, the decision was made that the field could not support the women's game on Friday in addition to both men's games. Lambert also added that until the petition, he was unaware that the women wanted to use that field. "It bothered me a little that they didn't come to me first," he said.

Now that he is aware of the problem, Lambert said that the soccer fields are "definitely top priority." Wilks said that the decision was made in accordance with last summer's agreement.

Meanwhile, as the women wait for a field, they are hurting in other areas. The budget for the women's varsity soccer team did not include money for uniforms at the beginning of the season; it had been cut. They were promised uniforms for their second season instead. Neddo found them used men's soccer uniforms to use.

The women are also playing on a field that is dangerous to the players and has been the cause of knee injuries and stress fractures, according to an MC athletic trainer. Neddo said of the bad fields, "They are bad for both programs [men's and women's], but concessions have to be made." The women, as a first-year varsity team, were chosen to be the ones to make the concessions.

When approached by student senators offering to help voice the women's grievances, the team seemed split over the issue. Some expressed concern that they did not want to pursue the issue of discrimination because they did not want to upset anyone, especially the football program, or endanger their team. As Wilks said when asked for a reaction to the situation, "The last thing this campus needs is a lot of dissension and pushing and pulling." Others of the women disagree, feeling that the issue must be resolved and not forgotten -- even if it makes some people unhappy.

Football Scots have optimism for last games

by Steve Hutton

The Scots' football team, despite its losing record, still has a winning attitude. "We have played some good football but have been inconsistent," said Head Coach Phil Wilks. "We haven't been able to put together a full game of good play." The reason for this inconsistency may lie in the adjustments in the program. For example, the team has a new head coach, many freshmen, and an entirely new system.

The Scots have received some fine individual performances from running backs Robert Cox and Chris Chaback. Both compiled over 100 yards rushing against Randolph-Macon, October 29. Other team leaders have been Jeff Reichert, defensive end; Russ Thomas, quarterback; and Hank Snyder, defensive end.

"I have a lot of respect for our juniors and seniors," remarked Wilks; "they have persisted through some rough times here...I think our freshmen have the same good attitude."

The Scots' strengths have been in their hard work in practice, and their good team attitude. They have confidence in their ability and are still expecting to win. This week they face Tennessee Wesleyan and later in the season have a contest against a very strong Emory and Henry.

The future looks good for the Scots' who lack only experience. With the talented freshmen of this year's team returning, Wilks is looking forward to very successful seasons ahead.

Since the production is still fragmented, Bradley said that it is difficult to judge its progress; he added, however, "I'm happy with the progress so far."

John T. Worth noted, "I feel that the production of the play so far is progressing at a moderate but safe pace."

Bradley pointed out that real momentum will pick up next week, when the production as a whole begins to take shape: "I'm starting to anxiously look forward to the time when the different elements, which have been developing separately, come together."

The result will be seen when The Memorandum opens on November 17; it will run through November 20.

questioned as to who she wanted to see in the vice-presidential office, replied, "I want Quayle because he's cuter." Quayle's youth was also sought after were because he could be molded to fit the Republican party's ideas.

Bentsen, an older Texas Senator, was chosen for an entirely different reason. Bentsen was selected to be the vice-presidential candidate because he is from Texas, an important state in the electoral race and George Bush's home state. Some observers felt that Dukakis can not win the election without pulling the support of Texas.

More recently, the vice-presidential candidates made headlines with their debate that, as the October 17, 1988, issue of Newsweek put it, "began with Quayle looking strong and confident, and ended by confirming many voters' doubts about his stature, maturity, and competence."

After the debate the overnight polls showed that Bentsen had won and that Bush had lost two to three percentage points.

According to Newsweek, Quayle was sent out to the "boondocks" for further campaigning after the disastrous debate: "Staffers could only hope that out of sight would be out of mind." This seems to be true for several Maryville College students who didn't think that the vice-presidential candidates had played any role in the presidential campaigns.

Students join homeless rally

by Bill Householder

On November 6, a group of 13 concerned Maryville College students representing the Peace Education Task Force, under the guidance of senior Steve Ledman, made a trip to Washington, D.C., to join over 1500 people at a rally protesting the condition of housing and the plight of the homeless in our country.

The students were invited to stay in the Mitch Snyder Shelter for the Homeless, a former federal building that Snyder and his group, the Community for Creative Non-violence, took over several years ago.

Of the shelter, Snyder said, "While it isn't housing, it's the nicest shelter in the country."

People from all walks of life and from all over the country came to the rally. Many adorned themselves and their cars with slogans protesting bad housing and the plight of the homeless, such as "Build Homes not Bombs," "Housing Now!" and "Nobody should live like this."

Many members of Snyder's group had been fasting for 46 days when the MC students arrived; their fast was to end on November 8, election day.

Other protestors set up sleeping areas covered in slogans and signs in Lafayette park across from the White House. One MC student, Bill Henderson, made this observation "[It's almost like] two Washingtons, one with pristine buildings, the other with people living in shelters."

The rally itself began at 10 a.m. Monday, November 7, with a march from the Capitol City Inn, a rat-infested hotel-turned-tenement in one of the worse sections of town, to the front of the Capitol building where the rally was to be held.

Cher, Casey Kasem, and pediatrician Benjamin Spock were among the many advocates of good housing who also protested

Seminar focus on date rape

By Jennifer C. Worth

The problem of date rape is a complex societal ill. Maryville College is not immune.

The Life Enrichment Center (LEC) will sponsor a seminar by Eileen Kogen, director of the Sexual Assault Crisis Center in Knoxville, which will focus on this problem, its causes, and its effects. The seminar will be held Monday, November 21 at 6:30 in Crawford House.

"Basically the most important thing we'll be discussing is the extent of the problem, because so many people who are raped by acquaintances don't even associate that with the term 'rape,'" Kogen said.

Jean Webb of the LEC noted, "People just aren't aware of it as a crime."

Kogen and some date rape victims will be discussing the issue; both men and women are invited. "We will be looking at some of the attitudes that foster date rape," Kogen said.

Kogen also noted that this problem can affect anybody. A Maryville College date rape victim, who did not want to be identified, said, "It can happen anywhere, anytime, with anybody."

She pointed out that date or acquaintance rape does occur right here on the MC campus: "I know two other people besides myself who have had the same thing happen to them....It's a lot more common than people think."

The effects of date rape are deep and complex; she said, "It's been a year and a half, and it's just now getting to the point where I can date like other people."

At the time, she would not have attended such a seminar, "because I didn't want anyone to know what had happened. I wanted to pretend that it didn't happen."

What advice what does she have for victims and potential victims? "I would tell them not to do what I did -- don't protect the person." She also recommended self-defense training and particularly "just being aware of what situations can lead to this, especially if you don't know the person very well."

Kogen noted, "Obviously, men don't want to be rapists; women don't want to be raped. But acquaintance rape happens anyway."

The Sexual Assault Crisis Center, formerly the Knoxville Rape Crisis Center, was founded in 1973. 24-hour Helpline is available toll free within a 40-mile radius of Knoxville at 522-7273.

The Center offers counseling and legal and medical advice about "all kinds of sexual assault," Kogen said.

COMMENTARY

Society blames rape victims

The world is full of victims. Most of us have been cast in this role more than once. We give our language such phrases as "victim of fate," "victim of bureaucracy," and even, as pop songs lament, "victim of love."

Obviously, some offenses are more serious than others, leaving physical and emotional scars on the victims. Yet society brands the victims of some of these offenses with a stigma that further harms them.

One topical example is victims of date rape.

No matter what the circumstances, rape is a heinous crime; the rapist shames as well as hurts. Date or acquaintance rape is even more terrible, because the assailants have betrayed the victims' trust.

Ironically, the victims suffer as much as (or more than!) the rapists from society's pointed finger. "She deserved it." "She must have done something to get him 'hot'!" "It was his right." It is no wonder that so few date rapes are ever reported!

No one "deserves" rape, any more than someone can "deserve" any other violent crime. And while the world is full of flirts and teasers, no one possesses the "right" to rape them.

The motivations behind this crime are complex, intricately bound in the net of societal attitudes and sex roles. It is a tragic "catch-22" that the same attitudes which create the crime deny comfort to the victim.

Date rape victims are caught in a vicious circle: to prosecute their assailants, they must brave societal derision and misunderstanding. Yet the time following an attack is the time when their courage and stamina are weakest. With their physical and mental strength at such a low ebb, they are often unable and unwilling to undergo the ordeal that society forces upon them. This second ordeal is no more excusable and potentially just as harmful as the first ordeal.

Many people are willing to help and sympathize with these victims (see related story, p. 1). They are, however, outnumbered.

Attitudes on this issue are changing, but not fast enough to help the multitudes of women (and they are primarily women) who have suffered the humiliation of date rape only to face further humiliation at the hands of the society they turn to for help.

This victimization of victims is not only damaging to the individuals involved, but it also place a blot on this country's lauded dedication to protect individual rights and serve the citizens.

We should turn our attention to this crime and its victims. The government cannot solve this problem; we must do it, by facing the problem and stopping the attitudes that compound it.

Students make D.C. stand

by Steve Ledman
(see related story, p. 1)

Thirteen Maryville College students sat in shocked disbelief as the disheveled-appearing white man shrieked, "Fire, fire; air, air; earth, earth -- mother earth!" in a mimic of an ancient Indian ritual chant.

The nine hours of empathetic conversation on the plight of the homeless which took place while traveling to Washington to take part in the November 7 Capitol Hill demonstration over the lack of affordable housing in America hadn't prepared the students for the powerful intonation shouted by this street person.

Somehow, homeless people had been imagined as victims unable to control their lives. This unkempt man's chant reminded students of a powerful Indian prophet, not of a helpless, homeless victim.

Yet this homeless man reinforced a theme central to the Washington protest organizers' message: homeless people aren't unable to control their lives; they are unable to survive in a society that is structured so that some have very much, while others have only unemployment and substandard housing that costs an ever-increasing percentage of any wage they might earn.

The 13 students and one student's mother had traveled to Washington to demonstrate on Capitol Hill so that this man might have a chance at a piece of an American pie that they had been taught was every American's inheritance. He was demanding a chance to inherit that right: a job with dignity at a decent wage, affordable housing, an education for his children, adequate health care.

The demonstration had been organized for this man's rights; for those rights Maryville College students were willing to sacrifice a weekend of college activities

Don't let apathy devour you

by Bill Householder

There is a plague that has spread across the nation. A plague that robs the body of its mind, its heart, and its soul. This plague starts with an "A," but it is not AIDS. It's much worse. It's Apathy.

Webster's defines apathy as a "lack of feeling; absence of emotion; indifference."

Apathy is a condition which destroys the very essence of humanity in us and brings us down to a level concurrent with that of a machine: cold and indifferent. It is a debilitating disease which causes its victims to turn away from things of importance and hold insignificant and trivial things in high regard.

People afflicted with apathy are usually heard uttering such phrases as: "It's not my problem," "It doesn't affect me," and the most common, "I don't care."

Unfortunately, many things people attribute these phrases to do affect them, are their problem, and are things they should care about. Many things, such as voting, the homeless, nuclear disarmament, the elderly, etc., people don't want to think about, much less acknowledge with protests or letters to their congressman.

What they don't understand is that just because they refuse to acknowledge its existence, it will not automatically go away. On the contrary, it will stay...and it will grow. There is a book by famed illustrator and author Maurice Sendak which addresses the issue of apathy. It is called Pierre and is subtitled "A Cautionary Tale." It is the story of a little boy who, in response to any question his parents ask him says "I don't care."

At one point in the story a lion says that he will eat Pierre and Pierre replies, of course, "I don't care". Naturally, the lion eats him, but his parents force the lion to spit Pierre back up and then send the lion on his way. After that experience, Pierre decides that he does care, and

A children's chorus composed of members of the Fourth and Fifth Grade Chorus of Linden Elementary School will join the Oak Ridge Chorus and Symphony Orchestra for this concert, which will feature Bach's "St. Matthew's Passion."

Rosemary Ahmad, music director of the chorus, will conduct. The concert will begin at 8:15 p.m.

Dent, who soloed with the Knoxville Symphony Orchestra last fall, is from Abilene, Texas, where he teaches at Hardin Simmons University, and English, a resident of Shreveport, La., teaches voice at Centenary College. Hinman and Smyrl are both residents of the Oak Ridge area who perform frequently with the Oak Ridge Chorus.

One Life To Live seeks campus set for 'Row'

(CPS) -- Hoping to ingratiate itself to some of its most avid viewers, the One Life to Live tv show is looking for a college campus on which to do some on-location.

The ABC daytime drama has placed ads in 50 college papers asking students to write and explain why their campus "would be the perfect location" for several episodes featuring "Fraternity Row," the program's "soap within a soap."

While just choosing a campus might have been a more conventional way to select a location, "this was a way to increase college enthusiasm for the show," said Jason Bondeross, the show's spokesman. "There was already a large college audience and this was a way to get them more excited about the program. It was fun."

"We're very open. The campus has to be in the United States, but it can be big or small, rural or urban," said Bondeross.

ABC's research indicates "many" of One Life to Live's viewers are college students, Bondeross said.

The unusual approach to finding a campus site for the opportunity to make contact with the college audience."

ABC would use the campus to portray the career of a young "actress," following her from modeling assignments to tv commercials to her role in the fictional "Fraternity Row."

"Fraternity Row" also provides viewers with a "behind-the-scenes look at daytime television," Bondeross explains.

And it also gives campuses a good chance to advertise themselves.

"From the number of college presidents, dean's offices, and individual students who have called in," Bondeross said, "it's been a very effective ad."

When the opportunity arises, colleges do compete fiercely to get their names and even buildings included in movies and tv shows. A number of schools campaigned in 1987 to host A Different World, the Cosby Show spinoff that takes place on a campus.

Spellman College in Atlanta eventually won the chance, but, although many of the set designs are based on real rooms at Spellman, the show's producers ultimately decided not to use footage of the campus itself.

Director Frank Bradley (right) coaches actors Bill Householder, Jennifer C. Worth, John Worth, and Missy Pankake during a rehearsal of The Memorandum. The play continues its run tonight, tomorrow night, and Sunday afternoon.

Rattle and Hum: U2's music narrates powerful story

by Andi Bristol

The plot is simple, the characters well known, Bono, The Edge, Adam Clayton, Larry Mullen, Jr. U2 Rattle And Hum is the story of U2. If you like the band, you'll love the movie.

The movie is, for the most part, a compilation of concert footage from their last American tour interspersed with few -- in fact, far too few -- clips of interviews with the band and recording sessions.

Despite the fact that I left the movie wishing I'd seen more of the personal side of the band, the concert footage perhaps conveys more about the band and its members than they could about themselves.

From Memphis to Tempe and lots of stops in between, each concert clip was another chapter in this story of a band and its growth -- the music is the narrator.

The movie shows the band performing their standard numbers: "Sunday Bloody Sunday," with political commentary a la Bono on the subject of the lawful assembly. Even though Snyder and the police had made arrangements ahead of time to have the civil disobedience under control so those who participated would not have to go through a long processing at the police station, the protestors had to go through much red tape, anyway. Many of the MC students did not get released until after midnight.

Those students who were arrested were Amy Bontrager, Missy Combast, Wendy Layne, Matt Wayland, Sara Townsend, Jennifer Conn, Heather Newell, and Bill Henderson. Olivia Kane, Wendy Layne's mother was also arrested.

The remaining students who participated in the march and rally were Steve Ledman, Bill Householder, Be Maia, Keri Terwedow, and Lesley Osborne.

Northern Ireland conflict and its violence, and "Pride (In the Name of Love)," with a silhouette of Martin Luther King, Jr. in the background.

The band also does a new rendition of "I Still Haven't Found What I'm Looking For" with Harlem's New Freedom Gospel Choir. While the religious basis of the song was obvious from the lyrics, the addition of the choir and their religious fervor gives the song a whole new perspective.

The new songs that find their way into the movie include "Van Dieman's Land", a moving and powerful song by The Edge; their new hit "Desire"; and "When Love Comes to Town" written in honor of B.B. King, who joins them on the track both on guitar and vocals.

Since a lot of fans have not had the opportunity to see the band live, this movie provides an adequate substitute and is well worth seeing.

Cookbook raises scholarship funds

by Jennifer C. Worth

Ever try peanut butter stew? How about "swope" bread? Want to make a casserole on a busy day? Or attempt cheese blintzes but don't know how? Need a gift idea?

The Maryville College Women's Club has the answer: The Educated Palate, a cookbook full of recipes from club members, faculty, staff, and alumni.

The cookbook is available for eight dollars in the bookstore or from any club member. A table for selling the cookbooks will be set up in Pearson's on December 8 and/or 9. All proceeds go towards MC scholarships.

Pam Bradley, who chaired the women's club cookbook committee, said that the idea for the project first arose at a club meeting last fall, when the group began discussing how many good recipes they had among them.

Low Rudisill, committee member and MC's director of camps and conferences, concurred, adding, "We had such a good meeting and such a good meal...the idea just went from there."

The club saw the cookbook as a potential fund raiser; "[Raising scholarship money] is one of the key things the women's club does," Bradley noted; "We thought this would be a good way to pull together on it."

Once the idea got underway, the club organized the committee, whose members were responsible for collecting recipes, organizing them, finding the bits of MC trivia that garnish the book, and actually executing the typing and printing.

The committee included Bradley, Rudisill, Marilyn Lewis, Sue Ramger, Connie Davis, and Bertha Kinsinger. In addition, June Parker was a driving force behind the cookbook idea.

"All through last year we had tasting parties," said Bradley of the recipe selection process.

Rudisill said of these gatherings, "We got to know each other better, and we got to experience the dishes."

In all, the committee chose nearly 300 recipes, mostly from women's club members and from alumni. "We really got a good response from alumni," Bradley said.

The recipes run the gamut from ordinary to exotic. "There are some international recipes," Bradley pointed out. "We're glad, because it's not like every

National college enrollment booms causing hassles large schools

by Michael O'Keeffe

(CPS) -- The final figures are not in yet, but most evidence suggests there are more students going to colleges nationwide this fall than last year.

"We expect enrollment to be higher this fall," said Elaine El-khawas of the American Council on Education (ACE) in Washington, D.C.

"Everybody I've spoken to refers to the fact that applications were up," said Bob Aaron of the National Association of State Universities and Land Grant Colleges. "That would lead me to believe that enrollments are up, but my guess is based on anecdotes, not actual enrollment figures."

The anecdotes typically concern jammed classrooms, packed dorms, and not enough teachers around to lead courses.

In mid-October, for instance, Stephens College in Missouri announced that it had too many students wanting to take a basic English course and too few professors able to teach it next semester, and thus they would have to turn away half the students signing up for the class.

At the University of Arizona, Assistant Fine Arts Dean Lynne Tronsdal fretted that UA's four-percent enrollment increase would threaten the school's ability to "serve these students in a way that they have a right to."

The University of Texas College of Liberal Arts is six to eight months behind in doing degree checks for applicants, officials conceded last week.

No one will really know what the nationwide enrollment figures are until at least December or January, when the U.S. Department of Education plans to release its official head count, department analyst Norman Brandt said.

In its annual back-to-school projections last August, the department predicted some 12,560,000 students would enroll this fall, up slightly from last fall's 12,544,000 students.

"That's more people than many countries," explained Anne Grosso of the College Board.

Scores of individual schools already have reported that their enrollments have increased -- in some cases dramatically -- since last fall.

Maryland's 19 community colleges' enrollment grew by seven percent, but some schools report increases much greater than that. Anne Arundel Community College, for example, has 17 percent more students than last fall, while Montgomery College's Germantown campus reported a 20 percent increase.

"Families are sort of cutting a deal" with their kids, James D. Tschechtelin, director of Maryland's State Board for Community Colleges, explained. "They're saying to young people, 'why don't you go for a [relatively inexpensive] community college for two years, and then you pick it.'"

Colleges in Utah, too, are reporting massive enrollment increases. Utah Valley Community College reports a 32 percent enrollment increase, while Salt Lake Community College has 66 percent more students than last fall. Utah State has 27 percent more students, while Snow College counted a 75 percent enrollment increase.

Southeast Louisiana, Arizona State, Northern Kentucky, and Indiana universities, many others, have reported high enrollments.

So have the universities of Texas and North Dakota.

St. Olaf, Grove City, Del Mar, and Rhode Island colleges, the universities of Texas-El Paso, Arizona, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, and Dallas, Mahkato State and Northwestern State universities all said they had more students this fall.

Not all schools, of course, have increases. The numbers

Debate returns ; team prepares to compete

by Lissa McLeod

Debating has a long history, beginning with the early Greeks and evolving into a modern team sport.

Maryville College also has a long history of debate, once boasting of a team that could better Harvard or Princeton. Three years ago alumni debaters contributed money to reestablish the program, and the program is now growing with the increased numbers of students on campus.

The Maryville debate team is a member of CEDA (Cross Examination Debate Association), the largest college debate organization in the country. This association deals with value-based propositions rather than the policy-based propositions of the other large debate association, the National Debate Tournament (NDT).

CEDA teams debate two topics per year - one in the fall and one in the spring. This fall's resolution was "Resolved: That significant third party participation in elections would benefit the electoral process."

Recent topics have also included "Resolved: That freedom of the press is oversized" and "Resolved: That covert action in Central America is desirable."

Debate Advisor Susan Campbell noted that there are misconceptions surrounding debate: "People think that if they are good at arguing and intelligent they are a debater already."

This is not the case. Training in debate includes learning skills such as processes of attack and defense, inferences, case writing, and format for debate. Cultivating these skills requires patience and persistence.

Once a debater acquires the necessary skills they must be able to apply the skills to changing topics and high-pressure situations. A typical CETA debate round lasts for one hour and includes a statement of the affirmative case, a statement of the negative case, cross examination, rebuttal, and concluding remarks.

Veteran debater Aelfraed Chiverton affirmed the value of this experience, saying, "You get a chance to use so many skills: debating, research, and critical thinking. It helps you become a well-rounded person."

Chiverton is the only returning debater on this year's team of eight. Because of the inexperience of the team members, the debate team is not competitive this semester.

Instead, they have tried to develop the skills necessary to be competitive in the future. Campbell hopes they will be able to compete at a national CETA tournament in South Carolina at the end of March, 1989.

In preparation for this tournament and to observe other students -- their competition -- in action, the debate team is traveling to the University of Alabama at Tuscaloosa this weekend. This trip will allow them to compare their preparation with that of other teams from around the country.

Campbell stressed that any students who might be interested in debate, especially those who debated in high school, come talk to her about the team.

Debate is a three-hour elective for the first two terms a student enrolls and then becomes a one-hour course for the remaining semesters.

While Campbell stresses that this is not a "light-weight" elective, she feels it is invaluable for someone who would like to develop techniques and skills for articulate verbal communication.

Chiverton added that "it is hard to understand how much work goes into it," but that with "every contest you grow even more."

Plans for the future of debate at Maryville College look bright. According to Chiverton there is a push to recruit more students for the team, possibly with the aid of several debate scholarships. There is also hope for more tournaments once the present debate squad becomes more competitive.

Students who are interested in participating in debate should contact Susan Campbell, 128 Sutton Science Center, or Aelfraed Chiverton, box 2302.

The other members of the debate team are Paige Dosten, Heidi Hoffercker, Katie King, Amanda Krenning, Richard McDonald, Michael Moore, and Jennifer Stanley.

ingredient. "It doesn't just have recipes; it also has tidbits of information and the drawings of campus buildings," Bradley said.

She estimated that the club has sold "close to 400" copies out of a stock of 1,000. Both Bradley and Rudisill stressed that the club welcomes any creative ideas from students on how to promote the book.

Rudisill noted, "We think that this cookbook would be a wonderful Christmas present for students to take home."

Looking ahead, the club is considering a second edition. Rudisill said, "We're certainly open to receiving winning recipes from students."

of students enrolled at Harvard and the universities of Illinois and Tennessee, for example, are down. Enrollments also are down at Louisiana State, Cal Baptist College and Christopher Newport College in Virginia.

Students seem to be the ones who suffer the most when the population rises at large schools.

"There's no question I'm not as effective as I could be," said University of Texas biology teaching assistant Mike Scioli of the huge sizes of his class sections. "I can't tell if students understand what I'm presenting, because they're afraid to ask questions in such a large class." Freshmen at Penn have had problems getting into classes that were already overcrowded before they were allowed to register for them.

Students at Rhode Island College, Clarion College, North Carolina State, and Western Michigan universities and the universities of Miami, Connecticut, and Texas, to name just a few, found themselves doubled-and tripled-up in campus housing this fall.

Campuses are getting overcrowded, moreover, just at the time when most demographers predicted college enrollment nationwide would drop precipitously.

The reason, they said, was that there are fewer 18-year-olds -- the people who, of course, traditionally staff freshman classes -- around.

The U.S. Education Department, in its "Back to school forecast," attributed enrollment's failure to crash to "small increases in the attendance rate of the traditional college-age group [18-to-24-year-olds] and somewhat larger increases in the attendance of women, older students and those attending on a part-time basis."

But now some think it may not crash at all.

ACE's El-Khawas no longer agrees that the number of 18-to-24-year-olds is declining. She believes the age group has hit a "plateau," while more of them are attending college.

But more significant, observers say, is the increased number of female and older students registering. "Now the average age of college students is 24, 25 years old," said Grosso. "There's a lot more adults going to school."

"There's a sustained and strong interest in college, and it's not just among 18-to-24-year-olds," Aaron concurred.

"The economy is shaky," added El-Khawas. "People feel they need all the education they can get. People are going back to school to get master's degrees and become specialists. They're responding to the economy. They're preparing themselves for the job market."

"More and more women are finding themselves as the heads of their households, and they want the necessary skills to support their families," Grosso added.

But many observers still believe enrollments will shrink eventually.

College enrollments will hit a high of 12,585,000 in 1990, the Education Department's Brandt predicted, but will drop to 12,408,000 by 1992 as the pool of 18-to-24-year-olds shrinks.

"There's a dip coming further down the road," said Grosso. "The number of 18-year-olds will decrease. That's a fact."

There's even former governor Lamar Alexander's recipe for "Tennessee apple pie."

Alums educate grassroots voters

From An SEP News Release

Recent Maryville College graduates Hubert Dixon, III, and Laura Starkey worked in grassroots organizing efforts to further voter education.

Dixon was part of a "David and Goliath" battle fought in the Kentucky election. He worked as a campaign worker for the Kentuckians for the Commonwealth (KFTC) promoting a state referendum to restrict the rights of strip mining companies.

KFTC placed Dixon in its Louisville campaign office to inform urban residents of the importance of the (constitutional) Amendment 2 on the state ballot. The campaign was aimed at ending the abuse of the "broad form deed," an archaic practice that allowed companies holding mineral rights to disrupt surface land without consulting the owners.

Mineral rights are usually held by land and energy companies in such cases, while surface ownership tends to be in the hands of people still living on the land, particularly in eastern Kentucky. Failure to control surface land use has meant trouble for agriculture and economic development in mountain counties.

The Kentucky legislature passed a law in 1984 returning control of surface land to owners, but the coal industry in 1987 won a state Supreme Court reversal (through a tied vote of judges) of the law.

Community organizations had no choice but to work to amend the state constitution to protect legislative protection of surface rights.

KFTC received widespread support from both Republicans and Democrats. Nonetheless, it face a major effort to explain the issue on a nationwide basis. A very technical and difficult amendment was on the ballot. The coal industry had the financial resources to oppose a "Yes" campaign.

The amendment effort also had to include reaching the large urban centers of Lexington, Louisville, and northern Kentucky, as well as western Kentucky.

Dixon was very active in explaining the "Yes" vote in Louisville: speaking to groups, contacting voters, and publicizing the issue. He explained how the empowerment of mountain people in control of land use would benefit city residents.

KFTC has begun to establish chapters in more populated areas, often on issues related to pollution and toxic waste, also raising land use questions.

In North Carolina, Laura Starkey worked in voter registration and "getting out the vote" under the auspices of the Piedmont Peace Project. Her work there was sponsored by an internship provided by the Southern Empowerment Project (SEP) in Maryville.

Starkey's work for Piedmont provided instruction on voting

Clothes make the employee, in bosses' eyes, so follow advice for successful wardrobe

by Jana Dalton

"Because I'm worth it," the ad claims.

And, actually, it's true, when you consider four years of college as an investment in yourself.

It's a sign of achievement, personal confidence, and the desire to grow. But regardless of where you are in your degree process, whether beginning or finishing, there is (or should be) another required course.

Most colleges do not offer it, but the business world expects it... "Successful Business Dressing."

"Clothes?" you scoff. "Who cares about what I wear?"

Well, no one. No one except your employer, and rest assured that he or she has very definite guidelines on the do's and don't's of dressing. And don't mistakenly think that a zesty personality or striking resume will camouflage a shoddy appearance. On the contrary, such personalities or resumes are rarely even noticed by a potential employer who has been turned off by sight alone.

First, impressions do carry weight.

For men and women alike, the first step in successful business dressing is research. Take time to visit the perspective firm during arrival and departure hours, or during lunch hours, in order to see the employees' clothing. It is important to be an individual, but it is equally important to blend with the environment.

If the company you're aiming for wears jeans and boots as a norm, then a three-piece suit is out of the question. And vice versa, of course.

Secondly, invest in a good interview suit. Make this one occasion that you are not concerned with "mix 'n' match," "blue light specials," or optional party wear. Like a uniform, it should be for one purpose only--to make your employer comfortable.

Today's fashions are less restrictive for both sexes, but standards do exist. A fine balance between a personal touch and good taste is the key to appropriate dress.

For men, the suit still survives as the be-all for business attire, although three-piece suits are declining in popularity. Men should also know that pastel-colored shirts and the use of accessories are on the rise, as men. The ambitious drive is still present, but the need to "power dress" is on the decline.

Women have slightly looser reign with their clothing. Suits or dresses are acceptable. But women must be ever aware of the working image these clothes convey.

Girlish, seductive, or masculine clothing is generally not conducive to an office environment. A conservative or sophisticated look is most flattering.

Colors, as with men's clothing, should be appropriate to the field. Banking demands dark, somber colors; advertising allows practically anything; law firms require a pin-striped, tailored design.

Skirt lengths are still in question, but slightly above-knee lengths are becoming more acceptable, while mini's are simply out of the question. Typically for a board meeting or an interview, below the knee is the safest length.

Be cautious of too much jewelry or make-up. You are part of a business environment, not a fashion show. The general rule: less is more.

If it seems overwhelming--relax. There are a few pointers that can transform the worst dresser.

Do--Be neat. Check for strings on clothing; scuff marks or heel damage on shoes (which should be cleaned the night before); wrinkled apparel. Creases are highly visible--so iron!

Don't--Wear synthetic materials. Polyester blends often convey cheapness, so stick with quality fabrics. Wear brightly colored socks or hosiery.

Do--Carry tasteful purses and/or briefcases. Leather in dark colors is preferable.

Do--Be well groomed. Invest in a good haircut and check nail appearance. Chipped, dirty or unkept fingernails are a dead giveaway that you are not a professional.

When you are preparing for an interview or for business dressing, remember the outer layer represents the inner layer. You've invested four years in your brain, so don't forget the packaging! Dress for success and experience the difference.

Intramural sports try to involve MC

by Steve Hutton

The purpose of intramural athletics is "to get non-varsity athletes involved in competitive sports and to provide them with a social opportunity," said Intramural Director Wes Moore. However, student involvement has been the biggest problem so far.

"The committee works hard to offer different things for everyone, but the students are too apathetic. The same people participate every time," said participant Kandis Schram. "Intramurals should be more social and fun; there's just not enough participation."

In the first two sports offered, tennis and football, there were few participants. Tennis had to be cancelled because there were not enough people to compete.

Football fielded only four men's teams and two women's teams. Captain Jody Ellis led the Scabs to the men's championship, while Sharon Wood guided PMS II to the women's title.

There are eight other sports offered this year. They include volleyball, billiards, racquetball, spades, softball, and doubles tennis. Ping pong registration has been extended due to lack of players and everyone is encouraged to sign up.

The singles events are scheduled by the students that participate. The two opposing players are matched up and given four or five days to play at a time convenient to both. The winner is then matched up with his next opponent.

Team sports games are scheduled twice a week, usually on Wednesdays and Sundays. There is no cost to participate, and competition is open to all students and faculty. To sign up, get a form from the displays in the P.E. Building or in Fayerweather Hall and return it to the box in the P.E. Building.

Ladies starter profiled

by Lori Chambers

The Lady Scots basketball team travels to Washington to start their season this weekend. Starting point Valerie Matlock has high hopes for the team's prospects.

This "quarterback" for the Maryville College women's basketball team says, "I have a feeling we will go far this year, especially since everyone is expecting great things from us." Matlock, a 5'3" sophomore is a 1987 graduate of Heritage High School. With a very rewarding high school basketball career. She was a three-year varsity letterman; captain, senior year; Honorable Mention All-County, senior year; Sportsman of the Year, senior year; and was Player of the Week her junior and senior years.

Matlock decided to come to MC because she had a good chance at a starting position.

As a freshman at Maryville she was awarded the Most Improved Player of the Year for the 1987-88 season.

Matlock feels that she has improved a great deal since last year, due in part to the team's hard work. The Lady Scots practice anywhere from two-and-a-half to three hours a day, six days a week.

The team has a lot of talent this year, and Matlock said, "I'm really excited about the team and the season." She feels that the team will end the season with a strong winning record.

The Lady Scots will begin their season by traveling to Washington, D.C., November 18 and 19 for a tournament. Matlock will be starting these games at the point guard position. She believes that the team will start the season off with a few wins in D.C.

rights and the process of voting. "How to vote" literature distributed in the state included photographs of Laura going through the steps of voting in polling places.

After graduation, Starkey and Dixon entered training to become community organizers through internships with the SEP. A 1988 Maryville graduate, Nancy Phillips, also participated in the program.

SEP is located in an office building a short distance from the Maryville campus. SEP's program included instruction and field experience during the summer of 1988 in Kentucky, Tennessee, and North Carolina. Starkey and Dixon were among 21 interns in the SEP training.

SEP provides assistance to those who complete its internship by providing information on jobs available in organizing and advice on seeking employment. Now entering its third year of programming, SEP has been successful in connecting its former interns with membership organizations requiring professional organizers.

Tennessee organizations active in SEP include the Tennessee Hunger Coalition, Save Our Cumberland Mountains, and Solutions to Issues of Concern to Knoxvillians. Other SEP member groups are in North Carolina and Kentucky.

Maryville students are invited to visit and speak to the staff at the SEP office, located at 323 Ellis Avenue. For those who cannot afford the cost of an internship, SEP can provide information on possible financial assistance to those who qualify as interns. SEP Coordinator June Rostan is a Maryville alumna.

Women's tennis team finishes winning season

by Yvonne Cosentino

The Maryville College women's tennis team finished the season with a 7-2 duel match record. The team placed fourth in the WTAC division.

"I felt that we grew as a team and that our overall performance was successful," said Christi Brown, a freshman player.

Other players include Raina Boring, Becky Shakelford, Heather Holm, Pam Hunter, Lynn Burgin, Ann Beatty, Andrea Dye, Vicki Wester, and Michelle Smith.

Coach David Cartledge said that they will lose two of the top six position players next year. "Raina [Boring] is our number one player. She's played with us for the past four years, and she'll be the hardest to replace."

Christi Brown's outlook for next season is that the team will be losing some really good players, but they are bringing back a lot of talent.

parents to help us, either. he and his parents live happily ever after.

Many of us, (Yes, myself included), are like Pierre; we are just too wrapped up in our own little worlds to care about anything or anyone but our lives and ourselves.

But there are people out there in the world who are like the lion and are waiting for us to say "I don't care," then they will do whatever they want to us and we will do whatever they tell us to simply because we don't care enough to question or challenge the lion. There won't be any

What should we do, then, in order to stay out of the lion of apathy's belly?

Bob Marley said it best: "Get up, stand up. Stand up for your rights." If something sounds or looks wrong to you, question it! Don't wait for your neighbor to do it, he's waiting for you. Don't turn your back on those less fortunate than you, they're your neighbors, too, and they need help. Care about yourself by caring about others.

That's the way we can climb out of the belly of the lion of apathy.

for the company of society's outcasts -- smelly, dirty, uneducated street people, fit, in some eyes, only for charity, not for a respectable place in society.

He, like most homeless, under-employed people was willing to work day labor building our cities; was willing to cook our food, wash our dishes, and carry our garbage; was willing to do those menial unprestigious things which are so necessary to our society's survival but which are considered worthy only of wages below those estimated sufficient to provide a family with a poverty level of subsistence.

For him, and those like him, Maryville College students were willing to sacrifice a weekend of college comfort to struggle, however insignificantly it might seem, for his rights and for society's dignity -- a dignity found when society's members, no matter their eccentricities or capacities, are afforded the right to work at a decent wage that enables them to provide for themselves and their families.

For this homeless man, forced into a shelter to be warehoused until disease, the despair of alcoholism, or the street's violence kills him, and for the millions of Americans working for minimum wages living in sub-standard housing that costs too much, 13 Maryville students and one parent were compelled to drive over 20 hours; to march through Washington's infamous ghettos; to gather below the symbol of America's greatness, her Capitol Building; and to try in their limited capacity to stop the madness of a society that spends more to kill people than it does to help them live.

Did the eight students arrested and the five students and one parent who joined in their protest at the Capitol accomplish anything? We can't know, but we would like to think that their trying made a difference. At least, in their trying, they fortify America's greatness -- a greatness built upon people's willingness to sacrifice of themselves for a better America.

For, as Mitch Snyder said, "If you do nothing, then you are guaranteed to achieve nothing; if you try something, then you are guaranteed to achieve something."

Yes, those who went to Washington tried something. Condemn them, laugh at them, or pity them; they accomplished what they wanted: America thought about the issue of homelessness one day before the election. She had their witness to her shame of children going without.

They were able to carry on the grand tradition of Jefferson: unwilling to stand passively by while a nation's priorities overlooked the rights of all its citizens, he, like the Maryville College demonstrators, demanded change.

Nursing degree joint program proposed

Nursing students, instructed by Gail Clift (center), study patient-care techniques using a classroom mannequin. Future MC nursing students will receive a joint degree with UTK, if a current proposal passes the Board of Trustees.

File Photo

by Andi Bristol and Jennifer C. Worth

If the current proposal concerning the future of MC's nursing program is approved by the Board of Trustees in January, the program will not seek accreditation from the National League of Nurses (NLN) but will embark on a joint educational venture with UTK, according to Dean Boldon, academic vice-president.

Major changes will be in store for the program if it does join forces with UTK, and the proposal angers many nursing students.

In 1986, the State Board of Nursing approved the opening of MC's nursing program, but the program's intention was also to seek eventual accreditation from the NLN.

In order to receive such accreditation, a college must first graduate one class of nursing majors. MC will graduate its first nursing class in 1990.

"What we're doing is changing the way that we're presenting the nursing program; the change is the joint program with UT," Boldon said. "MC would offer a B.S. [Bachelor of Science] in Health Care and the B.S. in Nursing would come from UT."

There are presently eight nursing students at MC. Those in the class of 1990 will be allowed to graduate as planned. The rest of the nursing students, if the dual degree program is approved, will be assimilated into the program with UTK.

Gail Fetter, who expects her degree in May 1990, said, "It's upsetting, because a lot of us depend on accreditation for a lot of important reasons." She mentioned graduate school and military careers.

Boldon, however, is willing to help the students around this obstacle. He pointed out that, under certain circumstances, lack of accreditation will not hamper military careers. In addition, only one graduate program in Tennessee requires NLN accreditation.

Fetter said that the dual degree program will not suit the needs of most of MC's nursing students: "A lot of us don't want to go to UT but want a four-year program."

Aside from UT, the closest such program is offered at Carson-Newman, about 60 miles away, too far for many nursing students who have local obligations.

Because of the proposed changes, Fetter said, "Our options are limited right now."

Some of the students may seek transfer to another program; the nursing professors--Gail Clift, Martha Craig, Gloria Nelson--are willing to help them in any way possible.

But not all of the nursing students want to transfer. As Fetter pointed out, many of them transferred to MC, and they are "tired of changing schools."

The reasons for the proposed changes in MC's nursing program as outlined by the proposal, which has already been approved by the ACC and the faculty and will be presented to the board, are as follows:

"A. The re-opening of Fort Sanders' School of Nursing raises questions about future support of the MC program and introduces a much cheaper competitor into the market of nursing."

Fort Sanders is the current facility being used for MC nursing students to get hands-on experience. Despite the fact that Fort Sanders has decided to re-open its School of Nursing, the status quo of the agreement with MC has remained intact. Questions were raised concerning MC's ability to compete with Fort Sanders in the nursing school market.

The proposal continues,

Senate plans budget policy

by Lissa McLeod

At the November 17 meeting of the Student Senate, Academic Life Committee members reported on a proposal from that committee recommending that only people who would complete requirements for graduation by the end of the summer be allowed to walk in May's commencement exercises. Exceptions would be made for fall student teaching or internships.

The present policy requires completion of requirements by December to walk in May. The committee was acting on concern that at least half of those who walked last May did not receive diplomas. This proposal is to go into effect with the class of 1990.

The proposal from the ALC went before the All College Council on Thursday, December 1, but Dr. Dean Boldon, academic vice-president, decided to take it back to the ALC for revisions, possibly concerning an implementation date.

Student Senator and ACC

member Sabine Hutchison said, "I understand their position, but it seems like students will be punished....If they expect to implement this policy, classes need to be offered every year and scheduling problems worked out." Hutchison also noted that this plan will require closer communication between students and their advisors.

Following revision by the ALC, the proposal will return to the Student Senate.

The Student Senate's last meeting of this semester, Thursday, December 8, covered President Ferrin's "vision paper," preliminary discussion of the Student Activity Fee, and a report from the Alcohol Task Force with their recommendation for the January meeting of the Board of Directors.

The vision paper is a picture of what the college will look like in 1994. It is not designed to provide specific policies, but rather to give the institution a common vision for the future. Staff and faculty groups have developed responses to the paper, and the students are now preparing their response.

Jon Allison, president of Student Senate, said that the administration is interested in "the students making comments so [their] opinions are heard." There is a copy in the library for any student who is interested.

Preliminary discussion of the student activity fee mainly included the schedule for the transition to a Student Senate administered distribution of the fees.

Student groups on campus will receive information in January on budget proposals and have until mid-March to submit budgets to the Student Senate. Budgetary officer Joe Johnson will be in charge of the process.

Allison hopes to have all budgets finalized and approved by mid-April.

The Alcohol Task Force reported to the Student Senate Thursday with their recommendation for the Board in January. This is the culmination of many months of work for this group. Student representatives on the group are Wendy Jo Medlin, Kristi Self, and Jon Allison.

Humbug? Make seasonal spirit

" 'Tis the season to be jolly," and to study for finals, and to fight shopping crowds, and to brave interstate traffic...

The weeks between Thanksgiving and New Year's seem to be fraught with hassles nowadays -- hassles that can cause headaches and insomnia. Indeed, the holidays have come to constitute a chore for many people, right down to the post-merriment cleanup.

Those people are likely to get coal in their stockings.

Granted, there are nerve-racking facets of the holiday season, but it's a mistake to get so caught up in these that we forget to enjoy ourselves.

Enjoyment is, after all, one of the chief focuses of any holiday. Christmas, in particular, lends itself to fun and good spirits, in addition to its central religious emphasis.

Relax; try not to let the crowds and the obligations get to you. Stress isn't good at any time of the year, but it's particularly insidious when it tarnishes the holiday cheer. Channel that stress into productive energy.

Since this season is primarily a celebration of giving, it can be enjoyed by people of all beliefs. As generations of carol composers and greeting-card writers have pointed out, often tritely, a charitable attitude can turn anyone's humbug December into a delightful and exciting time.

Christmastime is the season when it is socially acceptable for us to act like children, to heartily greet passing strangers, to fill our living space with gaudy lights and colors, and to sing out loud even if we can't carry a tune.

Christmas, like most good things, begins internally. If we decide to have a merry Christmas, then we will; our good spirits may well inspire others to make the same decision. Christmas carries its full significance only among people who have chosen to celebrate it by enjoying it, not among those who lose sight of it by selfishly griping about seasonal worries.

Editor's Notes

This is my last regular issue of the Echo; next semester I will officially hand the editorial reins over to Andi Bristol, the current assistant editor. I hope that campus support of the Echo and its staff will continue to increase; I am sure that Bristol and company will earn that support.

One last reminder - this is your newspaper. I have tried to be open to student, faculty, and staff suggestions and material, but sometimes that input just hasn't been forthcoming. The Echo staff will remain receptive to what you have to say; in the absence of any such communication, we have no choice but to muddle along on our own.

Thanks again and merry Christmas.

Memo probes man's bureaucracy maze

by Steve Ledman

"Throughout our lives we will be subjected to organizational bureaucracies, mysterious agencies where we deposit paper and our lives hoping for the delivery of some essential service.

From childhood we have been socialized to accept as necessary invasive bureaucracies which shuffle our paper and lives like numbers in a great computer. Federal, state and local social service organizations bureaucratically oversee the administration of our entire lives.

Most of the jobs we'll perform in the modern economy involve working within complex organizational bureaucracies established to expedite work tasks and to supervise our activities. When we reach old age, the Social Security Administration will manage the disbursement of the savings we've contributed throughout our lives to their bureaucratic organization.

We all recognize the limited control we have over our lives in the face of obstinate bureaucracies. Yet all of us recognize that bureaucratic organizations and our destinies are, for better or worse, inseparably intertwined. Consequently we feel an anxiety, a sense of helplessness and of meaninglessness, in our lives when we deal with the hopelessly removed and bureaucratic organizations modern man has created.

The Maryville College Theatre's production of Vaclav Havel's The Memorandum offered comic relief from the anxiety that modern man experiences when dealing with modern organizational structures. Maryville College students, under the direction of Frank Bradley, took their audiences into the belly of the beast modern man has created only to show us the ridiculous and the farcical there.

Bradley's production of The Memorandum was set in the constantly changing office of a well-known government service organization like the ones we deal with daily. There we are introduced to Mr. Gross, played by John Worth, who presides over the organization. Gross, like the bureaucrat we've all

Bidding farewell to Fiore

MC alum and former Head of Student Programming, Frank James Fiore, 27, died at Fort Sanders Regional Medical Center Nov. 23, 1988, following a long battle with cancer. Funeral services were held on Nov. 26, 1988.

Frank Fiore in 1987

Fiore graduated from Maryville College in 1983. While he was a student, Fiore was very active in the Maryville College Choir, MC Theater, and the Playmakers. He was a member of the St. Ginisius Society and Phi Mu Alpha Sifonia and Pi Gamma Mu Fraternities. He also was named to "Who's Who in American Colleges and Universities."

He returned to MC to serve as Head of Student Programming during the 1987-88 academic year after serving in the U.S. Army for three and a half years.

When he was asked in a December 1987 interview why he had returned to MC, Fiore said, "MC is where I am happiest."

Fiore also directed the 1988 summer Blount County Community Playhouse production of Cat on a Hot Tin Roof.

In lieu of flowers, those persons wishing to express their sympathy are encouraged to send memorials to the American Cancer Society.

Fiore is survived by his wife Maelea T. Fiore, a 1985 MC graduate; his parents, Frank C. and Kathryn M. Fiore of New York; his sister Katherine Rose Fiore, Louisville; and his brother, Michael A. Fiore of New York.

Holiday revelers: drink responsibly for best season

from Koala Center

Thanksgiving, Christmas, New Year's: a season for gathering with family and friends and for festive celebration—celebration that often includes holiday punch, spiked egg nog, and other alcoholic beverages.

For many people, the holidays are the only time of the year when they allow themselves to imbibe. For others, who drink on a more regular basis, the holidays are usually a time of increased consumption.

For those of you who drink and think you drink responsibly, how do you know when you've had enough?

"Tolerance to alcohol is a strange thing. There are still many things that we in the alcoholism field still do not understand about addiction and why some people can drink all their lives and not become alcoholic, while others become alcoholic almost from their first sip," said Steve Gould of the Koala Center in Oak Ridge.

Gould continued, "Whether or not someone is an alcoholic, one truth about tolerance remains the same: three drinks today do not have the same effect on a person as three drinks did a few years ago."

"For the alcoholic, his/her tolerance increases over the years, then levels off, then dips sharply toward the end of the drinking until one or two drinks can have devastating effects," he pointed out.

"For the social drinker [one whose drinking does not cause serious life problems], the big question then becomes, what is responsible drinking? When is it appropriate? When should one stop?" Gould said.

Keeping a count of the number of drinks you have, Gould suggested, is one way to drink responsibly. Legal intoxication in the state of Tennessee is 0.10 percent of blood-alcohol level (BAL). One drink -- one ounce of liquor, four ounces of wine, or 12 ounces of beer -- raises your blood-alcohol level 0.2 percent per hour.

"Take, for example, a party you may attend this holiday season," Gould said. "Let's imagine that this is a big occasion: an office Christmas party, a chance to let loose and revel in the end of a year of hard work. Heck, the boss may have even given you a Christmas bonus. You are ready for merriment!"

"Let's say," said Gould, "that during the first hour of the party, you consume three or four drinks, followed by two or three in the second hour and another two or three in the third hour....This puts you well over the limit."

Gould noted that at this point, it would take over two hours for the blood-alcohol level to drop below 0.10 percent, because your liver, which detoxifies the alcohol in your system, can only handle one ounce per hour. This is true whether or not you eat and regardless of the type of drink.

Gould said, "It's important to remember that alcohol is a sedative drug, which means that it literally 'sedates' or puts to sleep part of your brain -- the part of your brain dealing with reason and judgement. Therefore, after eight or nine drinks, reason is no longer telling you to quit drinking. Your emotions are in control now."

"A good rule of thumb for the holidays, or for any other time of year," Gould said, "is, if you think you've had enough, you have. If you (be honest) drink more than one drink an hour, don't drive."

He added, "And if your drinking even begins to cause problems with family, friends, job, the law, or self-esteem, you're on dangerous ground. Your social, 'responsible' drinking may be finished. If this is the case, get help."

Bryant brings talents to graphics

by Bill Householder

What do a lounge D.J., a poet, and a songwriter have to do with the Maryville College Graphics Department? They are all embodied in the same man, the new head of Graphics, Tim Bryant.

Bryant comes to MC from the East Tennessee Business Journal where he worked as production manager. He has also done a great deal of freelance work, which included designing logos for such groups as The Arthritis Foundation and Hilton Hotels International. Bryant also did layout and design for many flyers and brochures as well as cartooning and pen and ink illustration.

Bryant was born in January 1959 in Gary, Indiana. From there he moved to New Jersey, Alabama, Florida, Texas, and finally Tennessee. He now lives in Maryville with his wife, Roma, and their two "kids," Agnes the cat and Max the dog.

At the age of 14 he made his first professional art sale, a cartoon to the Chicago Tribune/New York News Syndicate. He attended the Harris School of Advertising in Franklin, Tennessee, after which he went to work for Trent Printing Company in Knoxville.

Next he worked as a D.J. at such places as 2001/VIP, InCahoots, and the Knoxville

Hilton; he's also recently helped open a teen club in Maryville called Our Party Place.

But how did an artist wind up spinning wax at night clubs? After playing guitar and piano on stage in Nashville for two years, Bryant was asked by the owner of a local bar if he could be a D.J. for them. "She asked me... 'Can you spin records?' I said 'Well, no. [At] party's I've put on albums before, but that's it.' She said, 'Well, get up there,' so that's how I got into deejaying was because I was a solo act in Nashville," Bryant said.

He played piano for the Birmingham Symphony Orchestra when he was 13. He and his wife have done duets at weddings and they almost had a record contract.

As Bryant tells it: "What happened was this guy heard our [demo] tapes and he said that he would back us for an album or a single or whatever, and since I had been in that jungle before I'm like 'yeah, sure, tell me more,' of course my wife was very enthusiastic. Well, come to find out the guy was embezzling, so he went to jail. I recently went to Nashville with some tapes and there are some people who are interested, but still when you come down to stuff like that it's like a dream."

been discussing an offering of nursing. The national shortage of nurses notwithstanding, future nursing enrollments are very uncertain."

"C. Nursing is MC's most expensive program and creates heavy demands for resources. A minimum of five faculty is required."

"D. Nursing accreditation is a very difficult process, and a liberal arts college is hard-put to meet many requirements."

"E. In keeping with MC programming in other technical fields like engineering, the nursing dual degree program allows MC to offer a program without overtaxing College resources. Students pursue a core curriculum and courses at the University."

Under the new system, students would take basic science courses and core classes during the first two years and do their clinical and upper-level nursing courses at UTK. They would also complete their Independent Studies at MC during the second two years.

Students, however, would reside at MC during all four years. According to Boldon, this would not be as inconvenient as it sounds because of the clinical work involved at various hospital sites, including Blount Memorial.

When asked what would encourage students to pay for a joint MC/UTK degree when a UT degree costs less, Boldon said, "Financial aid. Sometimes [with Financial Aid] the cost is not so different." He then added, "Also, the advantages that MC has to offer as a small college."

The consequences of the proposal remain to be seen, but in the meantime, Fetter said, "We're all walking around wondering what we're going to do."

LEC staff aims for well-being

by Missy Pankake

Crawford House is the tranquil-looking white house sitting on the edge of the campus next to Copeland Hall. The inside of the house, however, is bursting with activity.

The staff of the Life Enrichment Center (LEC), located here, works very hard on a variety of programs that affect nearly every student at some time or another. Their goal is to promote the well-being of every individual student by meeting the needs of the mind, the body, and the spirit.

One program that many of the freshmen have experienced firsthand is Mountain Challenge. Its purposes are to give students the opportunity to use and appreciate the mountains and to help students learn more about themselves by putting them into challenging situations.

The staff hopes to have an outing almost every weekend during the spring semester, and they will also be teaching kayaking classes.

Recently, the Mountain Challenge program received a $10,000 grant that is being used to construct an "Initiatives Course" in the campus woods that will be similar to the current Ropes I course at Wesley Woods. They will also use some of the money to improve their supplies and equipment.

Another service the Mountain

Challenge program can provide is renting camping equipment to students. If students would like to inquire about any of the Mountain Challenge programs, they can contact Bruce Guillaume, Larry Stanley, or Gary Black.

Students can also receive counseling at Crawford House. During working hours, there is always a counselor available. Students can get personal, academic, or social counseling from Tolis Vouyioukas or Cindy Davis.

Margot Eyring has done some one-on-one counseling with students who would like to quit smoking, start exercising, or lose weight.

She is also in charge of the Life Enrichment Task Force. The Task Force is a group of students who plan, organize, and run programs that concentrate on people's wellness and on community issues.

Their projects this year have included a time management seminar, an alcohol awareness demonstration that involved a wrecked car next to Pearson Hall, campus participation in the Great American Smokeout, a running clinic, and a seminar on weightlifting for non-weightlifters. The free aerobics classes five times a week are also sponsored.

see LEC, page 8

"Bike Tennessee '89," a follow-up to last year's LEC-sponsored cross-state trek, is already in the works. Emily Yarborough, director of communications; Ellie Koella, director of development and alumni relations; and Leslie Neir, director of campus life, discuss plans for the event.

been unfortunate enough to have to deal with, is a little rabbit of an administrator obsessed with forms and departmental rules. His obsession has rendered him a nervous enforcer of administrative policy who is constantly looking over his shoulder anticipating a calamity.

Gross' character, his paranoia, is a comic portrayal of the stereotypical administrator. Gross' skittishness is totally farcical until we are introduced to his staff and Ms. Ballas, played by Jennifer Worth. Ballas' watching of Mr. Gross and his staff's refusal to help him remove the farce from Gross' paranoia. Ballas and Gross' staff, like subordinates everywhere, do desire Gross' position, and they are conspiring to remove him from his job.

Browbeating Gross into submitting to her scheme to simplify office procedure in one of the play's many burlesque scenes, Ballas establishes her supremacy in the organization. The audience's sympathies are thus established with the comic character of Gross.

Gross' nemesis are Ballas and her assistant Mr. Pillar, played by Bill Householder, who try to simplify inter-office communication with the implementation of a new office language. The introduction of the language only subverts Gross' authority within the organization. Suddenly he isn't in control of his staff. Ballas' new language, like the "gobbledygook" used in modern organizations, can't be deciphered.

As Gross moves from one sterile office to another, the farce of the organization's new language, and much of the farce in our own lives, is exposed. He can't get anything accomplished. No one can interpret the new language, not even Ballas. He doesn't know what's going on in his own organization. Frustrated and confused, he has no escape from the absurdity of his own creation -- the organization.

Its order imposes itself on him. He's caught in a maze of his own making. His rules and regulations are being used to perform the utterly ridiculous task of implementing the new language and, with it, his own destruction.

And what a language it is -- perfect for any organization's survival. What better way for bureaucrats to justify their positions than through the attempted deciphering of meaningless memorandums? Gross is pitifully helpless in fighting the new language's allure.

His helplessness and anxiety increase with each impersonal interaction he has with his staff. No longer can he count on the orderliness of the organization for security and meaning. His is a life comically shattered by the illusory reason he has created in trying to sanctify his organization.

Frantically searching for reason and humanity in an unreasonable and unfeeling bureaucratic organization, Gross is Everyman, lost in the modern world.

Bradley's Americanized production of Havel's satire, The Memorandum, allows audiences to identify with Gross and his organization. With that identity, we're able to laugh at ourselves and the modern world we've created. We are Gross, caught in a maze of rules and regulations. Laughing at ourselves is a medicine, a relief from the often sterile and bureaucratic world we live in.

So, relieved, Maryville audiences might remember Mr. Gross the next time they encounter an intractable bureaucrat unwilling to perform some desperately needed service because the computer failed or some essential form was lost or filled out incorrectly.

Crawford House's pastoral exterior belies the bustle of activity inside. The structure houses the Life Enrichment Center.

Threadgill joins MC biology dept

by Lynn Smith

"It's nice to be on a college campus again," said Dr. Paul Threadgill, who joined MC's biology faculty this fall.

Threadgill's teaching load this semester includes a freshman inquiry class studying human biology, a course in the biology of spermatophytes, and independent study advising.

Previous to coming to MC, Threadgill worked on an Oklahoma ranch as a forester. There he applied knowledge that he gained from getting a bachelor's degree in biology and a master's degree in botany from the University of Kentucky, from studying ecology at the University of North Carolina, and from completing a PhD in plant population ecology at the University of Western Ontario.

After working as a forester, Threadgill wanted to return to his eastern Kentucky roots, and he knew that he wanted to stay in this area.

When he got the offer to teach at MC, he and his wife Debbie were pleased that they could live this close to his family's home.

"I like Maryville. There's something about a college of Maryville's size that gives everybody a community sense, and I like that!" he said.

So far he has had only 22 students, but he commented, "The students here are easily as good as those anywhere else."

Apparently the students also view Threadgill in a favorable light. Wendi Jo Medlin, a senior in his spermatophytes class, said of him: "He's easy to talk to and always makes time for his students. He's very down-to-earth."

She also commented on his style of teaching: "In his labs, we [the students] get to go into the college woods, actually examine what plants he has discussed, and see, firsthand, biology in all its interplays."

Next semester Threadgill is looking forward to increasing his course load by teaching Science 250, Biology 150, and microbiology.

From Oklahoma ranch to Sutton Center: Dr. Paul Threadgill is MC's new kid on the biology block.

Firm sells 'College Condoms'

(CPS) -- It's the final touch for the well-dressed college student: condoms in school colors.

Students at most schools will be able to get them soon, said Nicholas Fogel, Jr., president of College Condoms, the San Diego firm that's selling the devices to selected campuses in California, Arizona, Florida, Iowa, and Kansas, "if the market is there."

The condoms are sold in packets of six for a suggested retail price of $2.99. "At USC, the packets are three red and three yellow. At the University of California, it's three blue and three yellow. For schools with three colors it's two, two, and two," Fogel explained.

Red, yellow, dark and light blue, black, green, and pink condoms are now available, but students soon will be able to buy them in brown, emerald, white, "every color," Fogel promised.

The inspiration for the product came when Fogel attended a basketball game with an alumnus of the University of North Carolina. The friend wore Tar Heel sportswear, prompting Fogel to tease that he probably also wore a Tar Heel condom.

The idea stayed with Fogel. His first consignment of 14,000 packets went on sale four months ago. A second batch of 240,000 boxes is almost ready for the marketplace.

The school colors, Fogel claimed, "have relieved the stigma of buying a condom. [Students] don't feel like they're really buying condoms. They can joke about it."

So far, at least one outlet reports that sales of the condoms are slow. Mort Spiegel, manager of Campus Drug near Arizona State University, said, "People have to become aware that the product is here. We've sold a couple, though; I think it will catch on."

Smoking interacts with some medications, foods

from Consumer Affairs Office, FDA

Sure, you know that smoking can make you sick.

But did you know that smoking can affect the way your body handles the medicines which doctors prescribe to make you well? Or to relieve your pain?

These are among the interactions that the National Council on Patient Information and Education (NCPPIE) is trying to make people aware of during Talk About Prescription Month, now being observed:

If you're taking an analgesic such as Talwin, Darvon, or Darvocet-N for pain relief, smoking can reduce the medicine's effect.

In the case of drugs for depression -- Elavil, Norpramin, Tofranil, or Aventyl, for example -- smoking can shorten the time the drug is effective.

With oral contraceptives, smoking increases the risk of stroke and heart attack, especially after age 35.

Smoking can also reduce or shorten the effect of drugs such as Inderal for chest pains called angina, of anticoagulants such as Heparin, and for theophylline for asthma or emphysema.

What about alcohol?

The NCPPIE would like you to remember that beer, wine, and alcohol interfere with or react with so many drugs that the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) advises you use none of these alcoholic beverages while on any drug unless you have specifically asked your doctor or pharmacist about it and have been told it's okay.

Alcohol with some drugs can make you dangerously sleepy if you're driving. Some combinations can depress your central nervous system until you pass out or even die.

Don't stop eating, but NCPPIE and FDA say some foods also can interact with drugs. Salt interferes with diuretics. Hard cheeses, chocolate, and chicken livers can cause a

Tenn.'s Sasser to chair Sen. Budget Committee

Washington, D.C., -- U.S. Senator Jim Sasser was tapped by his peers earlier this week to become Senate Budget Committee chairman, making him the first Tennessean in 36 years to chair a major Senate committee. "The federal budget deficit is the number one problem that this nation faces today," said Sasser; "Being chair of the Senate Budget Committee is obviously going to be a challenge, one that I'm looking forward to taking on."

Sasser said that the Budget Committee is a sort of "super committee" that shapes a spending plan for the country by targeting dollar amounts to the pending priorities of the Appropriations and Authorizing Committees, as well as to the revenue goals of the tax-writing Finance Committee.

Sasser will officially begin his duties as Chair when the Congress convenes in January.

"This appointment will allow me to stamp values on the federal budget which are important to us as Tennesseans," said Sasser; "It will allow me to oversee those federal programs and projects that have been particularly beneficial to Tennesseans."

"We must address these deficits forcefully but without cutting into the kind of programs that contribute to the nation's economic strength and to people's basic well-being," Sasser said.

The last Tennessean to chair a major standing Senate committee was K.D. McKellar, who headed the Senate Appropriations Committee. McKellar was defeated in 1952 by Albert Gore, Sr.

Scots earn early wins, have optimism for playoffs

by Steve Hutton

With 10 returning players from a successful 19-7 season last year, the MC men's basketball team is off to a promising 5-2 start.

Of the team's seven opponents, four participated in last year's NCAA Tournament. They lost to Emory and Henry and N.C. - Wesleyan, but beat Centre and Fisk.

"We have an experienced team this year," Coach Randy Lambert said. "All of our starters had experience last year."

This year's team will be much like last year's in that it will be fast-paced and offensively proficient. "When we're in our flow, we are almost unstoppable," senior Dean Walsh said.

Walsh is the team's leading scorer with 16.8 points per game. He plays down low along with last year's scoring leader Scott Fletcher, who currently averages 15.1 points.

Senior Gary Andry's perimeter shooting is excellent and is sure to provide plenty of points for the Scots.

The other wing position is filled by junior Brett Stanley. Stanley is an exciting player with great athletic ability. In the Scots' home game against Johnson Bible College, he provided the crowd with a spectacular alley-oop slam after a feed from Pat Heldman.

Heldman is the catalyst of the Scot offense at point guard. "As he goes, so goes the whole team," Lambert said. Heldman currently averages 9 points and 7.5 assists per game.

The Scots also have some excellent substitutes.

Sophomore Jesse Robinette and junior Brian Bond play supporting roles on the wings, while junior Mark

Much is expected from freshman Tim Lawrence. His court vision and floor leadership allow him to play well beyond most freshmen. Lawrence is backup point guard behind Heldman.

The Scots' schedule is tough enough for playoff consideration. Many of the nation's top Division III teams are ahead on the roster, including Centre, Rust, and Emory and Henry.

"We need a 20-win season to make the playoffs," said Lambert. The Scots will need to play well consistently to win 20 games, but they are confident of their chances.

As Boucher said, "If we play like we can, we'll make the playoffs."

Lead scorer Dean Walsh jumps to make a shot during practice December 6; he and his teammates have led the Scots to five wins for a strong season start.

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Last chance to express yourselves! The deadline for submissions to Impressions, MC's art and literary publication, is Monday, December 12. Please submit your poetry, fiction, artwork, and photography to Impressions editor Ellen Foreman, c/o Box 2615.

Musical opportunity: The "Highlander Wind Ensemble" will hold a concert Monday, December 12, at 8:15 in the FAC Music Hall.

Hear ye, Hear ye, Poets and Artists! Next semester the Echo will run regular art, fiction, and poetry features. Any work that you have left over after your Impressions submissions, please send to Box 2820.

Bryant did have a composition of his recorded. It was a jingle for the 1982 World's Fair that was recorded by the Ray Stevens Band.

Songwriting is not his only forte, though, Bryant also writes poetry, some of which will be in the forthcoming issue of MC's literary magazine Impressions.

Even though on his first day at MC he was asked by The Tennessean to work for them, Bryant declined because "I saw the growth that the college has gone through and, of course, the good name and the established history of the college. I felt it was a very good move to go ahead and come over to the college...the foundation seems quite solid and, of course, it's the people that make it [that way]." He said, "I'm glad to be here."

As graphics designer for the college, Bryant helps work on Focus, the Grapevine, and other publications produced by MC. Joanna Bender, who works in communications, says of Bryant, "Tim is good. He's quick, he's real efficient, he's very easy to get along with. We have a good time working together. In comparison to what I've worked with before, he's very competent and he's a good worker." Bryant did have a composition of his recorded. It was a jingle for the 1982 World's Fair that was recorded by the Ray Stevens Band.

Songwriting is not his only forte, though, Bryant also writes poetry, some of which will be in the forthcoming issue of MC's literary magazine Impressions.

Even though on his first day at MC he was asked by The Tennessean to work for them, Bryant declined because "I saw the growth that the college has gone through and, of course, the good name and the established history of the college. I felt it was a very good move to go ahead and come over to the college...the foundation seems quite solid and, of course, it's the people that make it [that way]." He said, "I'm glad to be here."

Tuition increase slated

by M. R. Pankake.

Maryville College is increasing its cost from $9,445 in 1988-89 to $10,270 in 1989-90. That's an overall increase of 8.7 percent.

Tuition is raising 11 percent from $6,195 to $6,875. Dr. Sue Wyatt, vice-president for Student Development, said of this increase, "Our real priority is faculty/staff compensation."

Compared to other institutions of similar size and function, MC's salaries are on the low end of the scale, Wyatt said.

Although not happy with the increase, many MC students see the need for the raise.

Senior Amy Delf commented, "The teachers definitely need a raise. The base salaries they have here are awful."

Robin Caison, a senior, agreed, "I imagine [the faculty] are probably not getting paid as much as [faculty in other colleges]."

She was not happy at the rise in cost, however, and commented, "I'd like to know where the $9,000 is going now?"

Junior John Wilson said of the increase, "[The tuition] has gone up every year I've been here, but the last two years, it's jumped more than the first two."

Wilson wasn't against increasing faculty/staff compensation, but he said, "I want to know if they could get money for the teachers from any other source."

Board, which is basically the cost of meals is remaining static at the price of $1,815. Wyatt explained that the college is taking bids from vendors with the understanding that the vendor will come in at this level.

The Student Senate and the Dining Hall Committee are also looking at different meal options, including both a 19 meal-a-week plan and a 10-15 meal-a-week plan. These options will affect the price of the students' board cost.

Students attend Nashville conference

by Bill Householder

Five Maryville College students recently attended the annual Amnesty International (AI) Southern regional conference in Nashville at Vanderbilt University, February 24-26.

Freshmen Martin Capetz, Amy Bontrager, Tom Anderson, and Jim Rice and Sophomore Bill Householder attended the two-day, three-night conference and workshop sponsored by AI, U.S.A. This conference also marked the largest in the history of the Southern region's conferences. The Southern region of AI, U.S.A., comprises the states of Oklahoma, Texas, Louisiana, Arkansas, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Tennessee. Regional conferences are held each year to help individual groups deal with the different topics that AI confronts like the death penalty and refugees and to inform the groups about policy changes, media attention, and cooperation with other groups. Each national member group also has an opportunity to vote on resolutions that arise during the conference.

The members of MC's Amnesty chapter who went to the conference frequented those workshops which were more beneficial to the budding MC group. Many of these workshops dealt with what could be done on campuses to further the AI cause, including issues like using resources on campus effectively to promote human rights awareness in the community, dealing with prisoners of conscience, and working with the elected officials, the religious community, and the media.

As with anything, AI members have stories to tell, most of them depicting human rights abuses and showing what AI letter writing campaigns have accomplished.

Forum addresses Apartheid

by W.K. Layne

A forum on the issue of Apartheid in South Africa was held on Feb. 28 in Lloyd lobby and was moderated by Susan Campbell, MC Learning Center director.

Among the panel members who answered many questions and expressed opinions on this issue were Amadou Jannet, a UT student from Gambia in West Africa; Amadou Sall, a UT student from Mauritania, also in West Africa; Dr. Scott Brunger, MC professor of economics and instructor of the African Studies course; the Rev. Ann Owens Brunger, Campus Ministry associate and pastor of Highland Presbyterian Church; MC Freshman Chris Varner; MC Sophomore Rebecca Miller; Gary Hoemann of First Tennessee Bank, which invests funds for the college; and David Lantz, also from First Tennessee Bank.

The forum was well attended by MC students and some UT students, as well as by MC officials including President Richard I. Ferrin.

The forum began with the panel members opening statements, through which several of them offered information about the meaning of Apartheid.

Sall explained, "Apartheid is an Afrikaner word which means 'separation.'" [Afrikaners are the ruling white descendants of the 17th century Dutch settlers of South Africa.]

The policy of racial segregation, Jannet explained, "was first legislated in 1913 with the Natives Land Act, which removed blacks from most parts of the country and distributed them in pockets of land which became known as 'homelands.'"

Jannet further explained that the Afrikaner National Party gained the upper hand in South African politics in 1948 and legislated Apartheid mainly through the Population Registration Act of 1950, which provided for the classification by race of the entire South African population.

Sall relayed the basic effects of Apartheid on the black South Africans: "Blacks in South Africa have no rights at all. They are not given any human status. They cannot vote; they cannot move within their own country. And if [a South African] speaks up against Apartheid, he may be dead the next day or imprisoned at any time. Just one example of this is Nelson Mandela, who has been jailed now about 26 years. These blacks are controlled in this way even though they make up [about] 85 percent of the South African population."

For years the blacks in South Africa have been struggling against Apartheid.

As Jannet said, "racial discrimination led to the formation of the African National Congress (ANC) in 1912 which started the nonviolent campaign against

Use up the ozone by using CFCs

Take a deep breath. Now, how much longer can you expect to keep doing that? Not long, if we humans keep abusing our environment.

What do refrigerants in Florida, aerosols in Europe and burning forests in Brazil have in common? They are all chipping away at the ozone layer and contributing to the Greenhouse Effect.

A conference of 120 nations opened in London on Sunday to address the problems of the ozone. Several nations, including the United States, are petitioning for a ban on Chlorofluorocarbons (CFC's) by the year 2000.

The ozone blocks many of the harmful ultraviolet rays from reaching the earth; without it, we would basically be living in a microwave.

Thus, it is our responsibility, not as U.S. citizens, but as citizens of this planet, to take care of our world. The Earth is our host, and we are visitors. Would you, as an invited guest in someone's home, begin to slash up the walls?

The conference is a step in the right direction, but you can take further steps to help: Don't use products containing CFC's; urge you senators and representatives to take action; and help other people become aware of the problem.

Products containing CFC's include aerosols, refrigerator and air conditioning coolants, and styrofoam. If enough people avoid using these products, their manufacturers will be forced to find alternatives. If we, in turn, continue to put our money into these products, then it gives manufacturers incentive to fight against the ban.

Let's keep the environment safe. After all, it's the only place we have to live.

Students seek to free campus of all racism

by Aundra Ware and Lissa McLeod

1994: Maryville College -- "As the College has grown in the past six years, its minority and international population has also grown, and special efforts have been made to develop a sense of respect within the total campus community." (College's Vision Paper, 1989, p.6).

1989: Racial slurs spark violence on March 3.

Dr. Richard I. Ferrin's vision of Maryville College as a community accepting and celebrating diversity is certainly a commendable goal. Unfortunately, given the actions of this past weekend, this vision is far from fulfilled. While this violent incident was more notable than the subtle uneasiness felt by minorities on this campus, it is not the entire problem -- only a symptom of the problem.

Bank crisis relates to class

by Steve Ledman

Savings and loan institutions and the FSLIC (Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation) were formalized with the banking legislation of the 1930s. That legislation commissioned savings and loans to be safe havens for working people's savings. This mandate limited their activities to making mortgage loans for owner-occupied housing, and strict regulation was implemented to guarantee that the speculative motives of the banking industry were removed from working people's savings deposits. With this federal errand, the savings and loan industry contributed to the fulfillment of the working person's dream of owning her own home.

But with Roosevelt gone and the Great Society on forced starvation, fast-buck artists and their high-paid courtiers soon convinced an increasingly compliant Congress to deregulate the savings and loan industry. Like the logic which found that

Professor responds to Ledman's article

by Scott Brunger
Associate Professor of Economics

Steve Ledman's article on the effects of social class on MC students brings to mind an educational problem that I encounter teaching economics and international studies courses. Ledman points out that the dominant culture in America is taught in college.

That dominant culture demands correct written English, appreciates the fine arts, is conversant about Moliere, and strives for physical fitness. Though we joke about Yuppies buying BMWs and eating brie, we recognize that their intellectual training precedes their conspicuous consumption.

At MC I encounter a difficulty teaching about big business and world affairs, because students do not arrive from a social class that is familiar with such concerns. If your childhood friends have been children of multinational executives, your attention concentrates readily on Federal Reserve money supplies, dollar exchange rates, and Algerian foreign policy. If not, you only have four years here to catch up.

I taught children born to America's upperclass during a semester at Vassar. One such freshman complained to me that the "C" on a test would spoil his chances to go on to Harvard Business School, Yale Law School, and success as an international corporate lawyer.

BCCCP's Godspell features MC students and alums

By Kristi Giles

Moving from acting in the theatre to directing is a giant step. But for MC graduate Maelea Fiore, director of the Blount County Playhouse production of the musical Godspell, it is a step which has proven to be rewarding as well as educational. Though Fiore has had extensive theatre experience, Godspell will mark her debut as a director.

"I did my first two shows when I was in high school," said Fiore. "I did You're a Good Man, Charlie Brown and a production of Godspell my senior year. At MC, I did Fiddler on the Roof, Dark of the Moon, and Footlights." Fiore felt that her musical background was a great asset in preparing her for the directing of Godspell.

"For this particular show, my musical experience has been a definite strength," Fiore said. "I never did a straight play (a non-musical production). I did a couple of opera workshops while I was at MC. I was also music director at an Army post theatre in Lindberg, West Germany, and I did two shows there. I did some guest musical directing for the Maryville College Playmakers, too."

But the transition from acting to directing has not been an easy one, Fiore pointed out.

"This is the first time that I've ever had control over the whole thing," she said. "It makes me kind of nervous, because I've never done blocking before -- this is the first time that I have done that -- but I think that it is going well. I get a lot of help and suggestions from the cast which I use. It helps to get some outside input."

Of the eleven cast members in Godspell, two -- Sandy Brennan and Mark Koerber -- are presently MC students. Four members of the cast: Jeff Hayes, Mark Beyer, Diane Barr, and Kim Burnette are MC graduates.

For MC student and staff member Sandy Brennan, acting is a new experience.

"This is my first time on stage," Brennan said. "It's a lot of hard work, but it gives me a good feeling."

Part of the feeling, Brennan said, comes from the working together of the cast members.

"For any show," she said, "it has to be a group effort . . . individually you have to make an effort, but if all of the cast does not work together, that is going to make the chain have a loose link."

Former MC student Joe Chamberlain, the assistant director for Godspell, agreed with Brennan's theory, and also added that part of working well together means being able to relax and enjoy what is going on.

"It's marvelous," he said. "It's just a matter of having fun -- of developing a flow among the cast members."

The play itself is based upon the Gospel of Saint Matthew.

"Basically," explained Fiore, Godspell is a collection of vignettes, or skits, from the book of Matthew. Most of the skits are parables that Jesus told, such as the Prodigal Son, the Good Samaritan -- things like that. The play is very disjointed . . . there is a definite end to one skit and the beginning to another."

The religious theme, however, might bother some people, Fiore said.

"I think that a lot of people are scared of the show because they think that it is too religious," she said. "But I just looked at it as a play which just happens to be taken from and based upon a book of the Bible . . . We've tried to update it somewhat to this decade. In doing so, we've changed the way that we deliver a couple of the skits

MC students plan to relax over break

By Charlotte Borderieux

Going to Daytona Beach, sleeping all day long, singing for your supper, listening to your parents complain for a week. You may be wondering what these things have in common. Well, they are all things that can and most certainly will be done during Spring Break. Spring break according to Kathy North, an MC sophomore, "is a time to let your hair down and have fun."

Students are all making plans for this longed for holiday, but the big question in everyone's mind is what is everyone else doing over their coveted holiday? The answer to that question varies -- everything from partying all week to just going home.

The sentiment of "letting your hair down" and "having fun" seems to be evident in many people's plans even if they are simply going home.

Lee Ann Bieber, a MC freshman, said (Bill and Ted style) "We're going to have fun, dudes; we're going to see our awesome friends, and be beach-bum babies."

Although many people are going home to relax this week, not everyone has the same plan.

MC freshman, Trish Lunsford has other plans. "I am going to Nashville, GA. to visit an old friend and I am looking forward to it," she said.

The Maryville College Concert Choir will be on tour in Florida during Spring Break. The choir members seem excited for various reasons.

Choir member, Kerri Poore, a freshman, said "I think that it will be fun because I live at

There is a dull ache

Flowers red and flaming

But still
I am losing you

Dismas gives parolees a helping hand

by Jennifer Danner

"I was skeptical [about coming to Dismas House] at first," said ex-offender, David Walters, "Cause it's labeled as a halfway house, but once you have dealings with Dismas [you see that] it's not that. It's something more."

Walters, a Florida State University graduate in business administration, has lived in the Blount County Dismas House for six months and will soon be moving out of Dismas House and into the apartment complex he now manages.

Walters said of the transition from prison to the real world, "I could have called on my family, but I got myself into trouble, and I could get out. I wanted to do it on my own."

Dismas House provides ex-offenders (and students) with a place to live in an environment free of drugs, alcohol, sex, and violence, which are all strictly forbidden by the house rules. Besides that, Dismas is cheaper than other housing ($240 a month for room and board).

Francis "Brownie" Brown, president of the Blount County Dismas board of directors, explained the idea behind Dismas House, "The scriptural basis for Dismas House is a passage from Isaiah [61:1]. It talks about setting the captives free and releasing the prisoners. Now as I see it, the Dismas House concept . . . answers the question . . . to what [are we releasing the prisoners]; where do they go?"

"Dismas House is that 'to what, to where, and how,' he continued. "If you were to give a definition of a Dismas House, it would be a halfway house for ex-offenders to be reassimilated and reactivated into their respective communities and society as a whole."

The Blount County Dismas House, which was founded in 1983 as a spinoff from the MC February Meetings, is home to four ex-offenders and three students (Junior Andi Bristol, Seichiro Abe from Japan, and Freshman James Kirkpatrick).

Dr. Harry Howard, associate professor of political science, served on the original board, as Dr. Glenn Hewitt, assistant professor of religion and philosophy, and Dr. Dean Boldon, Academic vice-president do now. Also involved are Leslie Nier, director of Campus Life, and Dr. Sally Jacob, assistant professor of psychology, both of whom have cooked for the Blount County Dismas House.

It is the second Dismas House of eight and is associated through Dismas, Inc. The first Dismas House was in Nashville founded in 1974 by Father Jack Hickey and a group of Vanderbilt college students.

Heather Farrar, house director of the Blount County Dismas House, commented, "The idea was that college students and people coming out of prison are two groups of people who would be good together because they are both going through change . . . [Dismas] helps you learn how to give and receive, and you grow."

Some MC students have, however, expressed apprehension about being around ex-offenders.

Karen Schubert, a junior who plans to live at Dismas this summer, responded, "Before I went there, the concept of ex-offenders scared me, but once I got there and spent time with them, I realized they're not any different from anyone else. Some of them are now my friends."

Schubert added, "None of them [Dismas House residents] would think of taking or damaging another's property."

Walters said, "If we have a resident who comes here and see Dismas page 6

Dinnertime at Dismas House is the one portion of the day when residents can be assured of spending time together.

worth of all persons." (p.26). Obviously, the larger problem of racism is a lack of regard for this statement. This article hopes to challenge all members of the MC community to respond to racism -- both in this specific incident and in other more subtle forms.

To Ferrin and other college administrators:

1 -- We challenge you to take a strong, and immediate public stand that leaves no room for racism and other ethnocentricities. This policy should apply to the behavior and be expected of all MC employees and students as clearly outlined in hiring agreements and the student handbook. This statement should include sanctions for the violation of this policy.

2 -- We challenge you to find financial resources to enlarge educational opportunities about minorities. These opportunities would include the hiring of more minority faculty members and a competitive curriculum concerning minorities, such as a course in African-American studies and women's issues.

To the Faculty:

We challenge you to more fully integrate minority experiences into the courses you are currently teaching. This task is obviously more adaptable to some courses than to others, but can be a short-term effort towards bridging gaps in the minority education.

To the Staff:

We challenge you to facilitate a healthy community of diversity through your words, actions, and influence in the college community.

To Students:

1 -- We challenge ourselves to address the issue of racism in all of its forms -- both in our intimate communities and the international community.

2 -- We challenge ourselves to respect the guidelines in the student handbook that we agreed to follow upon entry at Maryville College.

To All Members of the MC Community:

We challenge ourselves to be more accepting of racial and ethnic differences with awareness and sensitivity that leads to an empowering experience for each individual and the whole community.

home, and I am always at home, so I'll be able to get away rather than everybody else not being able to go home. So, I'm really excited about going on tour."

Some students don't know what they are doing yet.

Freshman Carol Callaway, for example, when asked what she was doing for Spring Break said, "Right now it's a toss up, but I'm probably going to Louisiana and then to South Carolina to a military ball."

Some people's plans simply involve seeing their friends.

Amirot Willingham, an MC freshman, when asked what his plans were for Spring Break said, "I'm going to chill out with a couple of buddies -- probably go down to Miami and kick it up with my homeboys."

Whatever everyone will be doing, they all have one thing in common -- they are going to relax and have some fun while they can.

Internships make great summer jobs

by Jana Dalton

"Beware the ides of March." For though internships abound so do their application deadlines; summer jobs often interview and hire long before graduation caps fill the air. So revel in the dead of winter by exploring the opportunities for summer employment.

Internships are suggested programs, required for some majors, that offer in-depth, hands-on experience. Related to your major and interests, they are like smorgasbords, offering a time to test your abilities and "taste" a particular field without the confinement of a permanent position.

Internships and their details are as varied as the offered areas. Some are salaried, some full-time, some not. Certain firms maintain positions year-round while others have only summer openings.

In a personal interview regarding my own internship, Jean Jones, director of Career Planning and Placement (CPP), stressed the importance of researching prospective companies and determining who would be beneficial employers.

polluters needn't be regulated because the market always found the right cost for pollution, financial deregulation was sold as the market cure for an allegedly ailing financial industry. So over fancy meals in high-priced Washington restaurants, lenders convinced Congress that they could only lend in other markets (business loans, resorts, office buildings, junk bonds, etc.), then mortgage borrowers would benefit.

With deregulation, the corner savings and loan could play like one of the big boys -- all right and good in the free market -- for which it is meant. So savings and loans lent . . . to anyone with an idea. And when that idea seemed about to fail -- they lent it some more. The Gross National Product (GNP) grew . . . The "longest continual economic recovery in history" was thus manufactured -- borrowed, with bad debt teetering on the brink of foreclosure.

Working people are about to profit from the free market's experiment with deregulation, and President Bush just an-

"Look at who you would like to work for," Jones said. "Then call and ask them. Anything is possible."

If this approach is not for you, alternatives exist. The Internship Directory, at CPP, lists programs available. Advertising, public relations, park service, and law firms are an inkling of the variety. The Library also has numerous publications which assist in locating addresses, requirements, and specifications, especially the dreaded deadlines.

Summer jobs, on the other hand, allow for dabbling in multiple fields, provide good experience, not to mention a plausible method of reducing college costs.

Additional information is available in CPP, and certain employers contact Jean Jones annually seeking summer employees.

Old Man Winter is chilling once again, but summer is only a blink away. Polish up your resume and beat the summer no-job, bad job blues. Internships and summer positions are there for the taking.

nounced how he intends to ensure that working people continue to benefit. His rescue plan should only cost each of us $500 ($120 billion divided by 240 million U.S. citizens) -- if the economy performs as Bush's people predict. Yet the fearful question lurking between the lines of every news report is: Will the eventual price be another Great Depression? If not, will we have to learn the same lessons learned then of the need for government regulation? And if we don't need to learn old lessons, then why did we allow speculative interests to entrench themselves in the savings and loan industry again, with the predictable consequences of the current crises?

$120 billion would go a long way towards ameliorating class difference in the United States. Progressives have offered radical solutions to the savings and loan and commercial banking crises. Those proposals and the industry's objection to them will be discussed in our next look at the dynamics of class discrimination.

Abusive relationships are focus of Univ. of Cincy

(OCR) -- It's hard to believe: As many as 20 percent of students have experienced violence in dating relationships -- including hair pulling, slapping, throwing objects, and sexual aggression. More than half of the incidents caused injury -- but not the end of the relationship.

The University of Cincinnati (UC) has developed a pilot program to help students caught up in abusive relationships. Nancy Spence, director of the Office of Women's Programs and Services, explained the project at Towson State University's recent Conference on Campus Violence.

Spence has trained 20 UC students of both sexes to give a 70 minute presentation -- "Loving Too Much: Relationships That Hurt" -- to different groups on campus. Another 20 students will soon begin a second training program, attending weekly two-hour sessions for 8 to 10 weeks.

So much time is required, says Spence, because the students don't present information. They must be able "to handle the stories of abuse that come up." The material almost always triggers memories and emotional responses from some members of the audience. "Often," says Spence, "the audience has the best examples."

The presenters begin by asking participants to complete a questionnaire about their own relationships. True-false questions -- such as "My partner can one minute shower me with love and attention, then the next put me down," or "My partner and I share power and decision-making" -- are designed to get participants to think about their own relationships.

Using the questionnaire as a starting point, the leaders explore the characteristics of abusive relationships. They explain how such alliances often begin with a whirlwind courtship, since both partners feel a frantic need to bind -- and then easily become addicted to the relationship. The one who eventually causes pain is often highly romantic at first; on the other hand, the victim often feels a need to rescue the abuser.

The presenters next examine how people get into unhealthy relationships and what keeps them there. Abusers, for example have low self-esteem and rigid sex-role expectations, as well as a family history of violence.

Perhaps more important, the leaders offer suggestions for those caught in a web of abusive loves. Victims, especially, should find a support group and get counseling. And -- should they leave an abusive relationship -- they should expect to soon want their partner back. Since it takes 90 days to break an addictive habit, victims should wait three months before deciding to return.

But what about student services professionals? What can they do to help students trapped in these unhealthy relationships? Spence has a number of suggestions to use when counseling victims: Believe what the victim tells you; understand victim's attachment to abuser; look for cycles to the abuse; outline the pros and cons of the relationship, and cover all the options; give specific advice for ending the relationship, such as making the break definite and final, or changing the locks on the dorm room; help the victim develop skills to cope outside of the addictive relationship; and allow the victim to mourn the loss of the relationship if it ends.

When it comes to dealing with the abuser, Spence advises counselors to confront violent behaviors. The abuser must feel responsible for any violent behaviors, even if he -- or she -- feels pushed beyond control. Violence, she says, is a learned behavior -- and can be unlearned.

Brunger travels to African nations

by Bill Householder

Dr. Scott Brunger, associate professor of economics, left for a tour of five African nations as part of the YMCA program's investigation of these countries.

Dr. Brunger was chosen by the YMCA to travel to the African countries of Benin, Gambia, Senegal, Togo, Kenya, Uganda, and Zambia. He will spend three weeks in Africa and write evaluations of recent development programs implemented in these countries by the YMCA.

Some of the programs Brunger will be looking at are education in the use of microcomputers, secretarial skills, and commercial English. In rural areas, he will be observing programs of well-digging and irrigation.

While on his tour, Brunger will be joined by a Kenyan sociologist and two representatives of the YMCA's Continental African Alliance.

Brunger said, "The big issue that is dealt with is what these projects are trying to accomplish and whether or not it is accomplished. In other words, if you train carpenters, do carpenters who finish the program actually set themselves up in carpentry and become self-supporting people, or do they sit around saying, 'there really isn't any need for carpenters, but I now have a certificate -- maybe I can go to school and become an airline mechanic.'"

He also stated that he will be looking at how the programs help the YMCA in these countries. Specifically, Brunger will be investigating if the programs will help train good managers for future programs, if the programs create new membership for the YMCA, and if the participating countries themselves become self-supporting units without reliance on the United States or other countries.

Brunger said that what they are trying to do on this tour is see if the programs "are able to respond to the needs of their own countries and come up with positions about social issues in their own countries."

He also said that they will be looking at the bonds between certain U.S. YMCA's and African YMCA's to determine whether or not the money the U.S. YMCA's are raising and sending is serving a purpose.

Because there are not many major cities in Africa, YMCA's in Africa, like the ones Brunger will visit, are just beginning.

... causes problems in our little community, we have a way [through house meetings] of either correcting that or asking them to leave."

In response to students who have commented on the rules of no drugs, no sex, and no violence being too stringent, Bristol, who has lived at Dismas since this January, responded, "The rules add to the support system ... and nobody questions what you do out of the house."

Besides that, except for the three basic rules which are common to all of the Dismas Houses, the residents make their own rules. Bristol said, "[We] make all decisions as a house."

Walters added, "The key word is compromise."

Steve Souder, director of the Blount County Dismas House, said, "I really value the students; it wouldn't be Dismas [without them]."

Schubert pointed out some of campus -- and this is an unrealistic world."

Bristol said, "It's a whole support network ... It's great, and you don't get that at a dorm."

Souder said, "Dismas is a community of family ... with the goal of helping everybody to grow."

Bristol concurred, "Dismas is ... diverse people coming together who find a way to live together and build relationships."

When asked how he would explain Dismas House to someone who had never heard of it, Saddle offered, "If a person in Maryville ... has any curiosity about Dismas, I would invite them to come and check it out. You don't have to feel obligated to live here or cook for us; just come and be part of the community."

Walters replied, "I can't explain it; I'd just invite them to dinner."

that different meal options "should be available. I'm getting charged when I don't eat there."

Room cost, on the other hand, is increasing 10 percent from $1,435 to $1,580. This is due to planned residence hall improvements, including a plan to install phone lines in individual rooms.

Wyatt explained, "Students could bring their own phones and each room would have a different number."

While some students are in favor of this, others, like Royer feel that "a telephone extension and the extra $145 charge should be up to the person in each room."

Emily Yarborough, director of Communications, pointed out that MC is still cheaper than other colleges in MC's league like Rhodes and Sewanee.

"Students are still accepted without regard to their ability to pay," she added.

Some students were still not convinced that the increase was needed.

Junior Ellen Foreman said, "I think if we're increasing enrollment, there shouldn't necessarily be a tuition increase."

The increase goes into effect for the fall '89 semester.

Neddo resigns, others fill in

by M. A. Bristol

Director of Soccer Programs and Head Coach of the men's soccer team, Philip T. Neddo, resigned last week effective immediately.

In his letter of resignation, Neddo said, "It has been a tremendous opportunity for me to be associated with an institution like MC . . . . Now due to personal reasons, I feel it is time to resign my position at MC."

According to Dr. Sue Wyatt, vice-president for Student Development, arrangements have already been made to cover Neddo's duties.

"The assistant coach [Bakty Barber] will pick up soccer, and Dean Boldon has arranged to cover his classes," Wyatt said.

Boldon, Academic vice-president, said that Neddo's French drills would be covered by Viviane Williams, who taught them last year. He also said that the archery course that Neddo had been teaching would be taught by Dr. John Perry, associate professor and chairman of the physical education department.

Athletic Director Randy Lambert informed the soccer players as soon as possible after he received Neddo's resignation.

He said, "The players were the first to know; we had a meeting the night I received the letter."

Lambert also said that he had met personally with elected representatives of the team; Sophomore Randy Evans, Junior Matt Grandstand, and Senior Henry Marambio to discuss the search for Neddo's replacement.

"We have established a search committee," Lambert said. "They will be reviewing [candidates] over the next month. We have established a May 1 deadline for hiring."

He added that Barber would be one of the candidates considered.

Wyatt said that the search committee hoped to have as many candidates as possible on campus so that the players would have a chance to meet them.

Neddo said in his letter to the players, "Guys, I wanted you to be the first to know about my resignation . . . . Regardless of what lies ahead for me," he continued, "my main concern at this time is that the program I have had the privilege of being associated with continues to grow, through you, to its maximum potential."

When asked about the obvious rumors that would eventually spread around campus in light of Neddo's sudden departure, Lambert said, "I accepted his resignation and I accept his statement of leaving for personal reasons. I'm going to honor his statement."

One story, told by an Austin, Texas member of AI, was about a prisoner of conscience in El Salvador whose leg had been broken and shot and who had been denied medical treatment. Jude Filler travelled to El Salvador to speak with the Salvadoran equivalent of a prison warden about better treatment for this prisoner.

When she arrived at his office, she noticed that he was surrounded by boxes of letters, and upon looking closer, Filler found that the letters were from AI members around the world. Filler asked the warden about the letters and was told that he was trying to answer the letters because his predecessor had been fired for not answering them. Soon after her visit with the warden, the prisoner of conscience received medical attention.

Pieso Zavala of Louisiana stated one of the more important points an AI member must remember, "Don't be discouraged. After all you're doing what your conscience dictates. You're not here to win a popularity contest, you're doing what's right."

The MC's Amnesty chapter's story is just beginning. On Feb. 28, the MC chapter held their second meeting, where those who had attended the Amnesty convention discussed what they had learned.

He could imagine no other life, since his father worked on Wall Street. I disappointed him by stating that the only way to make good grades is to earn them.

Children of the upperclass have their own cultural blindness, though not about business and world affairs. That student knew that fortunes are made and lost on changes in government policy, so business newspapers were a necessity of life. He found economics an intellectual discipline very applicable to the world he grew up in. He considered foreign language a necessary means of communicating with future clients. European history was preparation for sightseeing during business trips. African Studies constituted a longterm investment with potential payoffs. His cultural blindness appeared when he looked at snow-covered mountains and wondered if they were a good backdrop for business conferences. He also drove home through Harlem and never noticed it from the expressway, because poor people did not matter to him.

In my subject matter, upperclass students are easier to motivate, though they suffer from blindness too. At MC you have to learn to appreciate the alien worlds of economic policymaking, international business, economic forecasting and African culture. By mastering unfamiliar subjects, you make fresh discoveries that upperclass students cannot. If you develop your ethical and aesthetic senses at MC, in later life you will not ignore slums or treat snow-covered mountains as backdrops. On the road to learning, upperclass students may start quicker than you, but their sense of direction may also be flawed.

"The legislation of Apartheid [in the late 1940s and early 1950s]," Janneh continued, "forced the ANC towards a more militant posture in its campaign against racism, as a peaceful protest, and ended in the shooting to death of several black civilians."

"Blacks," he said, "decided to unite and in 1955 the ANC drew up the Freedom Charter, which is still the basis for their demands for equality, [and which] states that South Africa should be a nonracial democratic society with every South African having a vote."

Janneh went on to explain how increased black resistance led to the Sharpeville Protest in 1960. Hundreds of black students were arrested and 68 of them were killed. This incident has become known as the "Sharpeville Massacre." It also forced the banning of the ANC and the Pan-Africanist Congress (PAC).

Blackleaders decided to go underground, and the South African regime took further repressive measures resulting in the jailing of several people, including Nelson Mandela.

During the following decade, there was acquiescence on the part of the blacks until around the mid-1960s when Steve Biko started the black consciousness movement. Biko, too, was killed on September 12, 1977.

Ann Owens Brunger, who has lived in Africa and met with leaders, such as Archbishop Desmond Tutu, discussed the incredible resistance to change in the Apartheid policy on the part of the Afrikaners.

These people, she explained, "felt very oppressed by the British who were trying to put them down at the first part of the century."

She also pointed out that the "strong resistance to change is also undergirded by the incredibly wealthy and materialistic lifestyle that the Afrikaners maintain . . . [It is] also undergirded by the perversion of the Christian theology."

The Afrikaner branch of the Dutch reformed church claims that the races were created separately by God, making the white race superior.

This view, however, as Scott Brunger noted, "has been condemned by the World Alliance of Reformed Churches."

Many black South African leaders, like Tutu, and organizations, like the Congress of South African Trade Unions which represents many black workers, have called for other countries around the world to impose economic sanctions upon South Africa in order to undermine the regime's resolve to continue the policy of Apartheid.

"Sanctions," Janneh said, "seem to be the only available alternative to a violent struggle . . . Sanctions have not been quite effective, mainly because Western countries, including the U.S., have been reluctant in imposing sanctions which have been recommended by the UN [United Nations] and various other countries."

Janneh went on to point out that "U.S. economic involvement in South Africa has helped to strengthen the economic arm of the Apartheid regime. They have become partners in the exploration of black labor. The tendency has been to focus on high returns and profits. That's why a lot of Western companies have investments in South Africa, because black labor is cheap."

The U.S. reluctance to impose sanctions is seen in the policy of "constructive engagement," which was begun by the Reagan administration in 1980 and is being continued by the Bush administration.

As Scott Brunger explained, "The administration's stand was that by not criticizing the South African government, it would allow the forces of the free market to make it inevitable that the blacks would be lifted in their standard of living, and the government would change internally, because you have to have a free people in order to have a free economy."

Brunger's suggestion in regard to the policy of economic sanctions was that we as a nation should "either put our money where our values are or quit talking like we have any values at all."

One question that Campbell posed to the panel was: "How is the U.S. involvement in South Africa interpreted by the world?"

Janneh responded, "The U.S. is seen as being the leader of the free world, as being a model of true democracy . . . but it becomes a paradox when such a model is seen to be having friendly ties with the most racist regime on earth."

There were some arguments presented against divestment during the forum. Varner pointed out that some countries are economically unable to impose sanctions. The Soviet Union, for example, which has strongly denounced Apartheid, badly needs the industrial grade diamonds which are found almost exclusively in South Africa. The United States, Varner said, faces many of the same economic dependencies.

He further noted, "Many of the African nations which despise the South African government are still forced to buy farm equipment which is essential to maximizing crop production in these countries which are starving."

The first objective for anyone concerned about the issue is, of course, to become educated. We must be cautious in this endeavor, however, for as Sal noted, "Whose information is given to us? It is the white's information for sure . . . it has always been that way. Most of the time the news has been distorted."

Brunger also suggested that we as a campus raise money to provide a scholarship for a black South African to attend school here at MC.

As individuals we can support divestment by the college as well as by the nation as a whole. We can educate our friends, roommates, and families by urging them to write letters to their congressmen and President.

Owens Brunger suggested that if we are indeed going to take a stand against racism, we should do it in a very direct, close-to-home way, and not just by working at a distance by doing things like supporting divestment.

We should, she said, "look in the eye of the fellow Maryville College student who has said a racist thing and challenge the racism right before our nose because it is here on campus. It is here in Blount County . . . Furthermore, we can refuse to buy diamonds . . . We can say to the man who has just given us a diamond ring, 'No, I won't accept that ring.' That's where [the struggle] gets a little more personal."

At the close of the forum, Sal's ending statement seemed to capture the underlying meaning of the South African freedom movement: "We are all human beings . . . there is no difference between us just because we are white, black, red, or yellow; we are born the same way and we are going to die the same way . . . We must think to ourselves that when one part of the human family is suffering, we are hurt, too."

Enrollment is going up

by Jennifer Danner

For those of you who haven't noticed enrollment was way up at Maryville College this year. And if it seemed large this year, just wait until next fall.

Carl Pagles, dean of Admissions and Enrollment Management, expects a comparatively large freshman class again next fall.

"Our goal is 250," he said. That's up from this year's freshman class of 227."

Pagles suggested several reasons for this increase. "I think the admission's staff... worked very hard last year," he said. "There was a general increase last year of interest, and I think... part of that came from the college participating in... the student search program... [which] brought a lot of response... [also] the college made the decision to increase the amount of financial assistance."

Of the 743 students Yarbrough related are enrolled, the registrar predicts that 100 will graduate in the class of 1989. If admissions reaches its goal, there will be 250 new students to replace the 100 seniors.

Academic Vice-President Dean Boldon, plans for a larger enrollment but doubts that classes will be any larger. "Four new faculty members will be hired in the area of physics and general science, psychology, business, and sign language interpretation. Also, we have budgeted for more part-time faculty," he said. Boldon feels that the new faculty will help with the class load in other departments. He explained, "If for instance we have someone new in psychology, Dr. [Sally] Jacob can teach more education classes."

Boldon added, "I don't foresee any big change; we'd have to wait in about 500 freshmen for there to be a big change."

This likelihood of a big change seems to be the same in terms of housing as well. This spring there are 359 students living on campus 194 of those

Gore to speak at commencement

by Jennifer C. Worth

Senator Albert Gore will deliver the commencement address at the 1989 ceremonies.

MC President Richard I. Ferrin said that Gore is "someone of real national prominence who has ties to the area," adding, "I think we have someone in Senator Gore who's going to make a bigger and bigger splash on the national scene." The most important reason, however, is Gore's "influence of values."

Dr. Ferrin decided to invite Gore in November, when he received an open letter from the senator about his trip to Antarctica to investigate environmental concerns. "It just struck me that here is someone who is interested in being more than a politician in power," Ferrin said.

After corresponding via mail and intermediaries, Ferrin officially invited Gore in January. They discussed the global environment issue, and Ferrin proposed that Gore conduct a world environment conference in this area. For now, however, the senator, who has spoken on campus before, will take things one step at a time.

Gore will be an appropriate commencement speaker Ferrin said, because "the values that he seems to be acting out are values which we at Maryville hold dear."

Having a senator speak at commencement is also "part of a conscious strategy," Ferrin said. "I am very interested that this college community has the chance to intersect regularly with national leaders." Such opportunities will help integrate MC into world awareness and help students develop into better leaders.

The past ten years have seen a variety of commencement speakers, ranging from local leaders like Edwin J. Best, then chair of the Board of Directors, and Dr. Ferrin himself, to members of world concerns, such as Mabubul Hag, director of the Policy Planning and Program Review Department of the World Bank, and Marian Wright Edelman, president of the Children's Defense Fund.

Choosing a commencement speaker is tricky because of the dual focus of the occasion. Ferrin said, "The difficulty with commencement is that people are really coming to honor the graduates. It can get schizophrenic." The best choice, he said, is "either someone of truly national importance or a member of the 'family'." Anyone in between can be "eminently forgettable."

Commencement exercises will be held May 14 at 2:30 p.m.

Pageant accents beauty, not merit

April Fool's Day will certainly hold a parade of Fools as 37 of MC's "bold and beautiful" strut their stuff in the Mr. and Miss Maryville College Beauty Pageant.

I understand that this event is being held to raise money for the senior class, and judging from last year's turn-out, I am certain that monetarily the event will be a success. What I don't understand is why it takes an event that places both men and women on stage like pieces of meat to attract such widespread campus participation.

This does not poorly reflect on Aelfred Chiverton, president of the senior class and organizer of this event; it does, however, say a lot about everyone who will attend the pageant. It raises questions concerning what we have learned at MC -- is this how we have learned to treat people, to judge them not on merit, but on physical beauty?

Is this what it takes to cure campus apathy -- a bunch of "beauties" strutting around in bathing suits? I wasn't aware that apathy was a hormonal problem.

The popularity of this event is beyond my comprehension. Beauty is, as the adage goes, only skin deep. The whole person, not just a pretty face or how much skin is bared in the swimsuit competition, should be judged. I am positive, however, that a campus event held in honor of persons who have made a significant contribution to the community -- a service project let's say, would receive about as much campus participation as a sewing bee.

Ban on semi-automatic guns violates U.S. Constitution

by Jim Rice

In this day and age, the federal government has expanded its control of society to a point where any radical or reactionary can holler and the government steps in to outlaw whatever is considered offensive. One such situation is the current fight over "Assault" rifles. This category includes the Colt AR-15 and the Soviet-designed AK-47. Unfortunately, this controversy has expanded to include any semi-automatic weapon, including many legitimate hunting rifles, handguns, and shotguns. To deal with the issue effectively, let's take it piece by piece.

First is the problem with defining assault rifle. In general, an assault rifle is an automatic weapon, capable of firing several shots by holding down on the trigger. In this case, there are very few true assault rifles in private hands, because true automatic weapons are very closely regulated by the federal government. In this case, the burden falls upon semi-automatic weapons which fire every time the trigger is pulled and are very legal because of their legitimate use as hunting weapons. This includes all the weapons in question, such as the AK-47 and the Colt AR-15, both of which can and are used for hunting. It is true that they can be equipped with large ammunition clips so they can fire 20 or more shots without reloading, but many other weapons can be as well with the simple purchase of a larger clip.

Another issue to be dealt with is whether or not the current import ban on "assault" rifles is redundant. On the federal books is a law which only allows import of weapons to be used for hunting purposes. This would make the executive order that President Bush issued illegal. Thus, only a congress-sional action will be able to halt the import.

Also, there is the problem of setting a bad precedent for later decisions. True, we might "only" ban assault rifles this time, but what will stop the government from extending the ban to all semi-automatic weapons, and from there banning all weapons.

NOW organizes march against anti-abortionists

from National Organization of Women press release

Washington, D.C. -- On television, unwanted pregnancy is usually a minor crisis. Abortion is available, nobody worries about the cost, and women don't die from botched, illegal abortions.

Furthermore, television college and high school students don't generally have sex and, if an unwanted pregnancy is part of the story line, "warnings" announcing the episode dealing with this "sensitive" subject are aired for several weeks in advance.

That's television. Real life is very different and, if the fanatical right wing succeeds in convincing the U.S. Supreme Court to overturn the Roe v. Wade decision which legalized abortion, most students won't recognize the America they will be confronting... and that will be confronting them.

For instance, only 20 years ago the state of California allowed only "therapeutic" abortions. To get one, a woman had to prove that there was a valid medical reason for an abortion, such as an imminent threat to her life, or she had to provide a certification from a psychiatrist that she would become mentally unbalanced if she was forced to carry a pregnancy to term.

Some women, the fortunate few with significant financial resources, were able to go to one of a handful of states where abortion was legal, or to a foreign country where the procedure was legal.

But for more women -- and even more so for teenage girls -- the choices were grim: They either carried an unwanted pregnancy to term, ultimately elect-

FAC Gallery shows collage of MC student art works

by Kristi Giles

There was no better way to examine the creative prowess and the ideas that MC students wish to express than to visit the FAC Gallery Show, which was open throughout the month of March. The student show displayed not one particular theme, but rather a unique collage of concepts.

Thelma Bianco, assistant professor of art said, "The exhibit is for both the competition and for art students to exhibit their work. For those competing, they have to make a certain score before they can be candidates for an award. We have three judges, and the winners will be presented at the Awards Banquet."

Those strict standards can certainly be met by several notable artists in this year's competition. One such artist is McDonnell's use of "mixed media," Bianco explained, "projects beyond a two-dimensional surface." This type of art is very beautiful and visually captivating, calling for immediate attention."

Other talent exhibited in this years show was that of Noel Royer, Julie Costner, and Karen Schubert, who presented works of acrylic, pastels, and water-colors. A very original collection of mobiles also were exhibited.

"A mobile is very difficult to do," Bianco said. "In a mobile, you have the problem of physical balance and visual balance. Not only do the sides have to balance, but the color as well."

A particularly well-done mobile in the exhibit was that of Freshman Brian Word, a cut copper sailboat mobile.

Perhaps the one weakness was this year's lack of student interest in the show.

"There was not the participation we have had in the past," Bianco said. "We encourage work outside of class, but there's a lot of apathy this year among art students. We have some students who do really good work, but just will not exhibit."

However, despite the lack of participation, the FAC Gallery Show was a success in capturing images of the students' personalities as a whole. Many inner qualities were unveiled in this year's exhibit, and it is a show which those who did participate can be proud of.

The next exhibit planned for the FAC Gallery will be of local photographers, a show which will be presented in conjunction with the upcoming Blount County Dogwood Arts Festival.

During march, the FAC Gallery exhibited student art works. This piece by Julie Costner was one of many on display. Jim Rice

Vinson holds contest

by David Vinson
Instructor of Mathematics

In January, I taught an interim on the history of film comedy. I had looked forward to the interim with great anticipation, diligently researching written film criticism to ferret out what were considered the genuine classics of the genre. I knew that most of the students would have only a passing knowledge of Buster Keaton, Charlie Chaplin, the Marx Brothers, and the like. I was confident that the students would come away with an appreciation of the evolution of comedy, and I personally looked forward to seeing many films familiar to me through my reading that I had never actually seen.

To my great surprise, the interim was poorly received. While class discussion was minimal due to the time constraints involved in trying to squeeze 22 films into 45 hours, we maintained a written dialogue in the form of daily journals. Some of the journal comments follow:

1) Charlie Chaplin isn't enough of a man for me to laugh at his movies.

2) Woody Allen again? This is torture!

3) This might be considered funny, if I was a lot older.

4) Cary Grant isn't enough of a man for me to laugh at his movies.

5) This would be funny if it was in color. (This comment was written for Young Frankenstein, intentionally filmed in black and white in 1975.)

6) In my opinion, Dr. Strangelove is the worst Peter Sellers movie I've ever seen.

7) Woody Allen isn't enough of a man for ...

Far and away, the most common criticism was my high regard for the opinion of established film critics. "Critics never like anything good", one person commented. "You should have let the class decide what we would watch". My response? "I don't believe that eight days of Chevy Chase followed by seven days of Eddie Murphy would be very representative of the complete history of the subject".

Pearsons' to become "alternative housing"

by W.K. Layne

MC students turning 21 on or before September 7, 1989 have the opportunity of applying to live in Pearsons Hall during the 1989-90 academic year.

Twelve female students have lived in Pearsons since September, with four of them residing in each of the four corner-apartments on the third floor.

These twelve students, according to Senior and R.A. Amy Lucas, "were essentially hand picked" on the basis of having reputations as being responsible students.

Selections of next year's residents, however, will be based on applications which will be reviewed by a committee consisting of Leslie Nier, director of Campus Life; Sandra King, assistant director of Campus Life; resident directors Shannon O'Brien, Perry North, and Vivian North; assistant resident directors Connie Stinnett and Jon Allison; and two current Pearson's residents. After reviewing all the applications, the committee will make recommendations to Dr. Sue Wyatt, vice-president of Student Development, who will make the final decisions.

King said that the committee is basically "looking for responsible adults who will respect their living environment." The committee members will be looking at applicants' GPA (a minimum of 2.0 is required), disciplinary records, and references.

King said that she expects "30-35 students to be living in Pearsons next year." Females will live on the third floor; males will live on the second floor.

There are several advantages to living in Pearsons, one being that there are a variety of room types. There are several double-rooms with hall baths, two double-rooms with kitchens and baths, and two rooms with kitchens and baths of their own. The second floor is also equipped with a large lounge.

Another advantage is that Pearsons' rooms have their own individual heating and cooling units, so that students can have heat, cool air, or hot water whenever they want them.

Furthermore, Pearsons has been recently renovated. The rooms now have new carpet, new mini-blinds, and fresh paint.

Because many of the rooms come with a kitchen, Pearsons residents will have the option of Lynn Smith (seen here with Scott Fletcher) is one of the senior women who currently resides in Pearsons. Next year the dorm will go co-ed for students over 21 years old.

Nunn's bill affects aid

by Amy Hudson

CPS -- Democratic leaders ended a three-day conference in Philadelphia on March 11 with a talk not about the budget, the Middle East, or the greenhouse effect but about college students.

They want students to join the military or perform a community service in order to get financial aid in the future, they said.

The aid, in turn, would be grants -- not loans -- that, of course, would not have to be repaid.

And while the idea of swapping college grants for "national service" is an old one, a number of plans now before Congress seems to have a chance of passing this year, observers say. The prospect, moreover, scares most college groups.

"Our group is opposed to any bill that would tie national service to financial aid," said Janet Lieberman of the U.S. Student Association, which represents campus governments around the country in Washington, D.C.

"I don't like it at all," said Daniel Martinez, financial aid director at New Mexico Highlands University (NMHU).

Critics worry campuses will become the exclusive property of rich kids, because everyone else will be working in hospitals or in the armed forces to get money for college.

Yvette Torres of the National Education Association, the country's biggest teachers' union, charges the idea presents, "serious obstacles to higher education" for middle- and lower-income students.

But some collegians like NMHU student Suzy Chavez say they like the idea, and the political leaders like House Speaker Jim Wright, Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell, Arkansas Gov. Bill Clinton and Democratic Committee Chairman Ron Brown who promoted the idea in Philadelphia March 11 called it a great way to feed volunteers into the public sector while teaching students that democracy has a cost.

Students also would graduate debt-free, the Democrats said their two-hour presentation.

The most popular plan, sponsored by Sen. Sam Nunn (D-Ga.) and Rep. Dave McCurdy (D-Okla.), would junk the existing financial aid system in favor of a "Citizens Corps."

Students would perform at least one year of community service -- at, say, a hospital -- or enlist in the military for a minimum of two years. They would earn vouchers of $12,000 for each year in the military and $10,000 for each year of community service, performed for $100 a week.

The vouchers could be used to pay for college or a down payment on a house. Single parents and those older than age 26 most likely would receive federal aid without serving.

A number of options have been proposed, including one by Sen. Barbara Mikulski (D-Maryland), in which students would do part-time volunteer work in exchange for federal financial aid.

Congress also is weighing a bill that would expand existing volunteer opportunities and even make community service compulsory, with holdouts paying an extra five percent annual income tax penalty.

Perhaps because of Nunn's stature as chairman of the Armed Services Committee, the senator's plan has attracted the most attention and may have the best chance of passing.

And while many students and educators seem to like the principle of national service, they strongly object to the Nunn-McCurdy idea of tying it to financial aid, something more than one college administrator, including University of Georgia Financial Aid Director Jerry McTier, has called "indentured servitude."

"I don't want higher education to become elitist, but we're headed that way now," McTier warned.

In response to such criticism Nunn said last month, "I do not think it's penalizing anyone to give them a one-year job experience, and to pay them, and then to give them a $10,000 educational voucher which does not have to be repaid."

Some believe the idea would be too expensive.

are freshmen. This figure is also up from last spring, but the problem of limited space is a long way from being a reality.

Davis, Copeland, Gamble, and Lloyd alone have a capacity of 446 residents, and Pearsons can house at least 84.

Sandra King, assistant director of Campus Life, does not expect that double rooms will be available next year or that freshmen will be able to have single rooms. "We have the space for people," she said. "The only problem that I can foresee is we may not be able to place them exactly where they want to go."

Pagles sees the growth as being quite beneficial particularly concerning the growth of extracurricular programs such as theatre, chorus and band. He feels another benefit is the excitement of having the dorms full.

Pagles holds, however, that the college could become too large, but that this is not likely to happen. "I don't think we'll ever see a time when... classes [are] of a size that take away from... an environment where people get very close attention," he said.

Local psychic does a booming business

by M. R. Pankake

Everyone at MC has driven by the house on Alcoa Highway with the blue sign standing out front advertising palm readings.

Madame Rene has been telling fortunes in Maryville for eighteen years now although she certainly doesn't look like it. She is not the stereotypical old gypsy woman hunched over her crystal ball. Instead, she is rather young -- late 20s, early 30s -- and has young children. She does look like a gypsy, though, and she speaks fluent Romanian.

"All my life, I've read fortunes," said Rene Williams. "It's an inheritance." She went on to explain that she never had to "learn" to be a psychic -- it's something you are born with.

"Lots of people try to learn to tell fortunes from a book," Williams said. "You cannot read a person by a book. You got to be able to read the individual -- their moods, their vibes. That is the gift."

Besides palm reading, Williams also uses a crystal ball, tarot cards, and handwriting analysis. "These are all part of being a psychic," she explained. All of these services are available for a fee, of course.

"I see the past, present, and future," Williams claimed. "I'll tell you about your friends/enemies, help you through business, and consult with you on all problems."

The types of people Williams sees are as varied as her talents -- from tourists stopping by to business men looking for advice to people who are active seekers of the occult. The number of people she sees per week is also varied. "Some days, only one person or no person will come by," Williams said. "Other days I'll see six, seven, eight people."

Just as Williams is not a stereotypical gypsy fortune-teller, her house is nothing like the image of a somewhat dark, carnival tent with a velvet covered table in the center.

Her house is very ornately decorated with lots of gold running through the wallpaper and upholstery. The soft green chairs, the thick carpet, and the beautiful wallpaper combine to give an air of rich elegance.

There are some oriental touches. Psychic page 7

This sign for Madame Rene's Palm Reading is hard to miss while driving down Alcoa Highway.

Student-run businesses mean bucks, experience

OCR -- The largest student employer on the U. of Pennsylvania campus is not the cafeteria, book store, or student union: It's the Penn Student Agency, which employs nearly 250 students in 18 businesses.

The concept of student-run business has been around awhile at a few schools, but not enough of them have recognized just how valuable such businesses can be -- to students as well as the institution. Of the 18 PSA "agencies" on campus, five are residence-hall convenience stores, two relate to food service and catering, and one offers temporary clerical support for university offices.

The agencies also provide students with invaluable business and management experience. "Students really learn what it takes to get along with others in all areas of business: finance, accounting, payroll, the computer resource department, public relations, marketing and operations," Bill Fox said, general manager of PSA -- and the only non-student within the organization.

"But the primary benefit to students is the jobs," he continued. "We employ students in everything from on-campus newspaper delivery (subscribers can get the New York Times and Philadelphia Inquirer) to selling gourmet coffee and candies."

Although the businesses are run by students, they operate under the auspices of the university -- which means that PSA funding comes out of the university's budget, and all profits return to the school. The university, in turn, funnels the money back to student workers in the form of financial aid. Most are employed under the work-study program, and receive an hourly wage for their work.

Each business under the PSA umbrella has a manager who hires and trains an assistant manager and support staff. And each business is answerable to the central finance and accounting staff, also composed of students.

PSA welcomes budding entrepreneurs: They can submit ideas for new businesses, and apply for a portion of the (somewhat limited) start-up funding. But ill-conceived ideas are not welcome: Each proposal requires a business plan and must also be test-marketed. Two of the PSA's newest businesses, the temporary help service and a small gourmet food shop, came out of this process. Both, Fox said, are doing fairly well.

"It's a big undertaking," he said of being a student and successfully running a business. "I'm amazed at how well students are juggling their time; they're all extremely dedicated."

Testicular cancer kills young men

What is it that every young man should know about cancer -- and that almost none does?

He should know that the Number One killer among men in their 20's and 30's is testicular cancer.

He should know, from age 15 on, what he should look for in a monthly examination.

Yet according to the FDA Consumer magazine, a study of 60 students at the University of Vermont showed that 75 percent had never heard of testicular cancer, and none of the students knew how to correctly examine themselves.

Testicular cancer several years ago meant almost certain death.

Today, advances in treatment permit 90 percent of the 5,000 cases a year to be cured.

Yet, partly because young men experience few cancers of other types, the cancer remains the Number One killer in young men -- accounting for one in seven cancer deaths of men in their 20's and 30's.

Early detection can further increase the cure rate. Perhaps nearly as important for many, removal of a single affected testicle need not mean that sex is over. (An artificial testicle is often implanted).

The examination, recommended by the American Cancer Society to all men 15 to 35, is easy: merely pick up and roll each testicle gently between the thumbs and fingers of both hands to check for any hard lumps or nodules. The exam is best done the first of every month after a warm bath or shower when the skin is most relaxed.

If anything suspicious is found, get to a physician promptly -- to determine if it really may be cancer.

If you would like additional information on Early Detection of Testicular Cancer or Life After Testicular Cancer write to FDA, 297 Plus Park Blvd., Nashville, TN 37217.

ing to keep the baby or give it up for adoption; or, as was the case with an estimated one million of them, they risked their lives and irreparable damage to their reproductive organs in secret, back-alley abortions.

What were the consequences of the latter choice? An estimated 100 of every 1,000 women and girls who put themselves into the hands of medically untrained back-alley abortionists died from the operation. Thousands more were maimed to the point that they were never able to conceive and bear children.

Because it could happen again -- not years from now but months from now -- the National Organization for Women is organizing the April 9 March for Women's Equality/Women's Lives in Washington, D.C.

In fact, NOW President Molly Yard is predicting that the anger and fear generated by the U.S. Supreme Court's decision to hear a major case challenging legalized abortion will result in the April 9 march being the largest march for women's rights in U.S. history.

Yard noted that among those groups displaying the greatest response are college students. "Right now, a month until the march, there are student organizers signing up people for buses on at least 100 campuses," she said, "and the number of campuses participating in the march grows each day, with each phone call our organizers make."

"College and high school students -- the young -- have the greatest stake of all in this fight to keep abortion safe and legal," the NOW president said. "It's their future we're fighting for; they're the ones who must feel the greatest urgency to retain the legal right to decide when, and if, they will have children and how many children they will have."

On January 9, the Supreme Court announced it would hear Webster V. Reproductive Health Services, an appeal to uphold the constitutionality of Missouri's abortion law, which also seeks to challenge the constitutionality of Roe V. Wade. Missouri's law had been declared unconstitutional by both a federal district court and a federal circuit court of appeals. On November 10, 1988, just two days after President Bush's election, the U.S. Department of Justice sent a message to the Court asking it to hear the Webster appeal and to use the Missouri case as a vehicle for reviewing the Roe decision for the purpose of overturning it.

Yard said an overturn of the Roe V. Wade decision would mean a return to compulsory pregnancy for American women and girls or, in the alternative, situations where they would risk their lives in back-alley abortions and would be prosecuted as criminals if they survived the ordeal and were discovered. "Not only must every woman and girl in America care about this fight, but so also must every man who cares about the women and girls in his life, whether it's his wife, his girlfriend, his sister, his daughter or, yes, even his mother."

Campus groups and individual students interested in organizing a delegation or simply participating as individuals in the April 9 March should contact their local or state NOW chapters or contact the National NOW Action Center. The address is 1000 16th Street, N.W., Suite 700, Washington, D.C., 20036-5705, and the telephone number is 202-331-0066.

Miller cited for sexism in spring break inserts

CPS -- For the second time in two months, a major beer company has gotten in trouble with the student press.

This time, Miller Brewing Co. of Milwaukee has sent a letter to the editors of 55 college papers apologizing for a "sexist" spring break advertising supplement that, Miller said, it had really meant as a satire.

"We blew it," the company wrote in apology for its supplement, called "Beachin' Times" and laced with references to women as "babes," suggestions for luring women to bed ("swallow her car keys") and entreaties to "name something you can drink, bump and poke. Hint -- it's not a Babe. It's a volleyball."

It was almost Miller itself. The University of Wisconsin at Madison's student government proposed a student boycott of all Miller products when it saw the 16 page, four-color insert.

The Gamecock at the University of South Carolina, the Daily at the University of Michigan and the Tribune at Marquette University had refused to include the supplement in their pages when they first previewed it in January.

"There was not a place in 16 pages that you got the impression that men and women talk to each other without men being drunk and scamming on people," said Maggie Sarachek of the University of Pennsylvania's Women's Alliance.

Miller sent the insert to only a few of the 55 papers for which it was intended, and that was a mistake because CASS, the Evanston, Ill.-based ad broker firm that arranged to distribute it, didn't halt them in time.

"The piece wasn't being interpreted as parody," said Bev Jurkowski, Miller's public relations manager.

"The people who objected were 100 percent concerned about the sexist aspects of the guide," she added. "But the ad included information about responsible drinking. It was a high-quality piece."

Peter Herman, editor of the Marquette Tribune, disagreed. "The message was nothing but drinking. It had no value."

Herman said the Tribune lost "400-to-$500" by refusing to run the supplement. "If it was a parody, I missed it."

Education estimated the Nunn-McCurdy plan would cost more than $50 billion a year, compared to the current federal student budget of $9 billion.

Jenny Jones, a spokeswoman from Nunn's office, acknowledged the senator is willing to work on a compromise solution, but he remains "wedded" to the idea of tying the proposal to financial aid.

Jones also disputes the notion the idea would cost more money. "This is a deficit-neutral proposal," she maintained.

Even so, NMHU's Chavez wondered of many students would find the economics of volunteer work practical, given that they still have to live while earning voucher credits.

"Most people would not want to work for $100 a week," she said. The American Council on Education (ACE) predicted many students who enlisted in the armed forces or for community work probably would never graduate.

An ACE study of the kids who enrolled in college for the first time in 1980 found that only 20 percent of the students who interrupted their educations to return to work had graduated by 1986. Among the low-income students who had to leave for college for a while, only eight percent had a degree by 1986.

Chavez, for one, predicted many low income students in particular would use their vouchers for a house instead of for a college education.

"We would definitely see a huge impact," said Carolyn Zehren, aid director at North Dakota's Jamestown College. "Many would enter the workforce with no college education."

UND commuters organize center

OCR -- It's not easy for commuter students to "main-stream" themselves into campus life. Joining an intramural sports team, for example, is difficult when you don't know anybody. Also, it's hard to meet students with similar interests when every on-campus hour is spent in class or in the library.

The University of North Dakota hopes to help its 6,700 commuter students become more integrated into campus life through two new services: the Off-Campus Student Life Center, and Students Living Off Campus (SLOC), a student organization.

"We've been concerned for a long time that commuter students really aren't experiencing what college life is all about," said Gail Baker, advisor to SLOC. "So, we decided to develop opportunities for them to interact with students like themselves -- to see that there's more to college than attending classes and turning around and going home."

Space for the new center opened up when an art museum in the student union moved out. Baker successfully lobbied the union to donate the space, which is currently furnished with tables and chairs for students to converse or study. The large room will eventually be remodeled, using a portion of money that the union sets aside for non-operational programming, says Baker.

The center will then feature separate spaces for a peer assistance center, quiet lounge, and a small commons area with tables, sink, and a microwave. The kitchenette, Baker said, will help ease overcrowding in the cafeteria downstairs -- and give commuter students a chance to eat decent meals.

Students Living Off Campus is not directly connected to the center, but the two share the same goal: to build a sense of community among UND commuter students. Primarily a social organization, SLOC coordinates activities such as bowling, rollerskating, and ski trips.

One student proposed that critics are "too predictable". I propose that we test that theory. Over the break I spent a couple of days going through newspapers and magazines, compiling various critics' top ten list. As a result, I have a master list, sort of a super-critic's top twenty. In alphabetical order, those are:

- 1) Au Revoir Les Enfants
- 2) Babbette's Feast
- 3) Big
- 4) Bull Durham
- 5) A Cry In The Dark
- 6) Dangerous Liaisons
- 7) Hairspray
- 8) Hotel Terminus
- 9) The Last Temptation Of

- Christ
- 10) Married To The Mob
- 11) Midnight Run
- 12) The Naked Gun
- 13) Rain Man
- 14) The Thin Blue Line
- 15) The Unbearable Lightness Of Being
- 16) Who Framed Roger Rabbit
- 17) Wings Of Desire
- 18) Women On The Verge Of A Nervous Breakdown
- 19) Working Girl
- 20) A World Apart

Choosing from this list, construct your best guess at the super-critic's top ten. I will run a Spearman's rank correlation on each entry. The entry with the highest positive correlation will win two tickets to the fabulous Foothill's Cinema, where you can watch any old crummy movie of your choice (although if you choose The 'Burbs, you'll be sorry).

One last thing; as in the rest of your college career, you should DO YOUR OWN WORK. Entries with the same value of the rank correlation coefficient (rounded to the nearest thousandth) will be destroyed. The contest is open to everyone who hears about it. Entries must be received by April 15th, either in my box (2847), or at my office (Sutton 208). Winners will be announced when I get around to it. One entry per person, please; your first one is the only one that counts.

This form of gun control is in direct conflict with the Second Amendment of the Constitution, which states unequivocally "...The right to bear arms shall not be abridged." If the government does ban "assault" rifles, then it will be invalidating the document that it is based on.

In the end, the burden must rest with the populace. We may have to risk an occasional tragedy to be able to protect ourselves. Before the assault rifle, mass murder still took place with knives, clubs, and other means of killing. In this day and age, the government can not afford to not protect its citizens from the killers on the street, so the people have a need for a means to protect themselves.

Robert Heinlein wrote "There are no dangerous weapons, but there are dangerous people. The common man needs a means to protect himself from dangerous people, and the banning of assault rifles would set a very bad precedent in the field of self-protection."

Ferrin wants students to devise honor code

by W.K. Layne

Lately, there has been some talk around campus about a new honor code that President Richard I. Ferrin would like to implement.

Ferrin is very interested in the idea of an honor code for MC, because he sees it as a possible solution to problems concerning the issue of integrity.

"The issue for me," he said, "is how we develop an internal sense of integrity."

A problem with developing such integrity may exist, Ferrin said, because some people may have the attitude that one can do anything he wants as long as he doesn't get caught.

This is a destructive sort of attitude to have, Ferrin added, since "[for example] cheating... [or making] racial slurs or sexist remarks shows not only a lack of respect for others, but [they] are also self-demeaning."

Ferrin does not wish to set forth any specific ideas or guidelines as to what an honor code would entail, because he feels that in order for the idea to work, "it has to bubble up from within the student body."

"What I have heard in talking about this with some others," Ferrin said, "is that it wouldn't work, that our students aren't interested in that kind of thing."

Ferrin suggested that one reason that such a negative response is anticipated is that the term "honor code" has bitter connotations of rigidity and control.

"The last thing I want to do is to get hung up on the phrase 'honor code'," he explained.

In fact, Ferrin suggested that it would be very appropriate for MC to devise its own unique term to replace 'honor code,'

The alcohol policy: How will it be implemented next year?

by Lissa McLeod

The alcohol policy has been a much debated and discussed topic in the past year as the school "moved toward" a new policy. As the new policy slowly goes into effect — beginning with selection of residents for a 21 and older residence hall — many students, faculty, and administrative staff are wondering just how the new policy will affect campus life next year.

Sue Wyatt, vice-president for Student Development, foresees little change she said "For all intents and purposes, we [Student Development staff] have operated much the way we will next year."

Jon Allison, student member of the Alcohol Task Force and assistant resident director of Lloyd, predicts the new policy will make the staff's jobs in the residence halls much easier. "With the new policy my job becomes much more of a black and white issue," explains Allison.

Instead of making ID checks on persons consuming alcohol who are possibly underage, anyone drinking in undesignated areas will be written up. Allison adds that support for these staff members from the Office of Student Development will be crucial to the success of the policy.

Wyatt said plans are in the works for training sessions on the alcohol policy for newly hired RAs and SAs; adding that all staff members for next year have copies of the new alcohol policy.

Certainly, the present alcohol policy has come a long way from the one presented to students in February 1988. This is largely due to the work of the Alcohol Task Force and the establishment of a process by which to implement the new policy.

This process began this spring with the Office of Student Development asking the Student Senate to assist them in formulating a selection committee to screen applicants for Pearsons Hall — the 21 and over approved housing.

The Student Senate provided the Student Development Office with the names of two current Pearson's residents who are graduating in May and an at-large May graduate. Along with the current resident directors and assistant resident directors, this committee screened applications for residence in Pearson's next fall.

Wyatt said that everyone who applied to Pearson's has been accepted, adding that the requirements for admission were fairly minimal. She encourages

Professors need time for students

Enough has been said about student apathy, but what about faculty apathy?

I was shocked to hear the tale of woe that one of my most dependable reporters had to tell. She was trying to do a story and went to interview a faculty member who told her that he didn't have the time to talk to her and that she should go see Dr. So and So. Dr. So and So quite rudely told her that he was too busy to talk to her and that she needed to talk to another Dr. So and So.

The availability of faculty to students is, for many students, one of the main reasons they attend MC. But how available are the faculty?

Most of the faculty members are willing to help students and are available to them and go far and above the call of duty to do so, but others just can't find the time to see a student who is not currently enrolled in one of the professor's classes.

As a liberal arts college, MC attracts students who have other interests beyond their major areas. I would hope that professors would be just as willing to talk to and help these students as they would the best and brightest student in their major, and would make the time to see them.

Unfortunately, certain professors just can't seem to take the time out of their busy schedules to see students. But isn't the primary concern of faculty the students themselves? It should be, but it isn't always.

Those of you who do make yourselves available to students, Bravo . . . Those of you who don't, perhaps it's time you re-evaluated your priorities.

What can be done about getting rid of campus apathy

by Ellen Rosenberg

CPS -- Some students may act like they don't care. But, deep down, I believe that most wish they could be more involved in campus activities. Far too many have told me that they stay in their rooms feeling unconnected, but not knowing how to take the first step. They're scared, and worried about feeling like an outcast among cliques that already exist. So, they don't join in, secretly wishing they could.

Many, who may appear apathetic, actually can't imagine fitting even one more thing into their already hectic schedules. Commuter students often talk about their two or three jobs -- and how they must rush to attend classes, only to leave campus quickly afterward. For many, further involvement on campus just means added pressures. The bottom line may appear to be apathy, but in reality, involvement is simply not a consideration.

What can be done? How can students who are hiding behind their books be drawn out? Here are some suggestions I hope will complement what you are already doing on your campus:

1. Strengthen social skills and offer specific approaches during freshman orientation and within freshman-experience courses. These sessions can boost confidence and empower students to initiate relationships and join in activities. Any interested staff -- including the dean of students, RAs, peer advisors, and counseling staff -- can facilitate discussion about interpersonal relationships at floor meetings or rap sessions.

2. If only a few people can be counted on to attend an event, ask each person to bring one or more. Aside from instantly doubling the attendance, those who might otherwise have been reluctant to go alone will have the security of company. This also applies to RAs who can offer to go to activities with students on their floor.

3. Remind students they're welcome to participate to the extent they can -- without facing judgement or resentment about not doing more. Let them know, for example, that it's okay if they attend one meeting, miss the next four, and then return; it's also okay if they prefer to sign up for only one committee or one project. A little involvement is better than none at all.

4. Active organization members must accept and be sensitive to the time limitations of others, as well as the need to eliminate cliques and reach out to new members. They can learn new responses and behaviors in discussions and role-playing exercises. Anonymous sharing can provide an excellent, less threatening outlet for feelings that might be too difficult to share aloud.

Ferrin addresses issue of South Africa

by Dr. Richard I. Ferrin
President of Maryville College

Sitting there on the lounge floor with about 30 students, I listened to seven panelists discuss apartheid.

Two black African panelists gave words to the pain and urgency while the freshman debater, sounding too smug, argued against divestment. The laconic sophomore said we must not forget the hundreds shot in the back while running from the police. The investment adviser, without tie and jacket, encouraged us to see the complexity.

If we divest our Coca-Cola stock, do we pick up Pepsi knowing Pepsi and its Pizza Hut subsidiary are going great guns in the Soviet Union? Besides, by divesting, we give up our rights as stockholders to call the offending companies to account.

The economics professor, who had lived in South Africa for several years, let us know that economic sanctions had been successful in turning the tide in Rhodesia, and now Zimbabwe. Of course, the Russians and Chinese, helped quite a bit.

But it was the Presbyterian pastor, who stirred me. While she joined the chorus supporting divestment, her real point was that divestment is easy. Perhaps too easy. Once we have rallied together and persuaded the college to divest, what then?

Actually, her word wasn't "easy." It was "cheap." And she must have had Bonhoeffer on her mind when she started talking about the cheap and the costly.

She pricked our consciences when she said that divestment is not the first thing we should do. Confronting our own racism

Pro-life or pro-choice?

What is your opinion on the abortion issue coming up for review by the Supreme Court later this month?

Jim Shook Steven Lantrip

"Killing is morally wrong, and although you can't legislate morals, keeping abortion legal may lead easily persuaded young girls into something they would not otherwise do."

Bill Hendrson

"No matter what you think about it morally, abortion is not going to go away by making it illegal, so why not keep it legal to protect the health of those women who are going to have them anyway."

Steven Lantrip Jim Rice

"I believe that the woman has the right to choose and that the Roe vs. Wade decision is probably the best compromise. Overturning the decision will burden state legislators with trying to come up with regulations for abortion and just as much controversy will exist, but at the state level."

NOW protests Domino's owner $50,000 donation to Operation Rescue by boycotting the pizza chain

by J. M. Rubin

(CPS) -- Angered by the head of the Domino's Pizza chain's $60,000 donation to a radical anti-abortion group, some campus women's groups want to convince college students around the country to stop buying from Domino's.

"This is an issue students can focus on, one where they can be effective. What's more important than pizza?" asked Sally Packard of Goucher College's (Md.) Women's Issues Group. So far, it's had a dizzying effect on some pro-choice groups. "One day we were buying it and the next day we were mad at them," said Colleen Dermody, press liason at the National Organization for Women's (NOW) Washington, D.C., headquarters.

"This is serious. Feminists live on Domino's pizza."

The effect so far on Domino's, which considers the campus market as one of its most important, can't be measured, company public relations director Ron Hingst said.

The groups -- led by NOW -- are aiming to hurt Tom Monaghan, who built Domino's into a giant 500-store franchise operation. Monaghan has used his fortune to buy the Detroit Tigers, amass a huge collection of houses and furniture designed by Frank Lloyd Wright and, especially in recent years, agitate against abortion.

Most recently, he gave $50,000 to Operation Rescue, a militant anti-abortion group that is best known for harassing women as they try to enter abortion clinics.

Domino's Farms, the pizza chain's parent firm, also donated $10,000 to the group.

"We're protesting the gift to this specific group," said Connecticut College senior Stephanie Muller of POWER (People Organized for Women's Rights). "Their tactics are particularly radical and obstructive to women's groups."

NOW Vice President Pat Ireland called group members "the racketeers of the Right to Life movement."

She said group members have physically blocked clinics' entries, "called every five minutes to tie up phone lines (and) made false appointments, giving them access to waiting rooms and keeping legitimate clients out. They harangue patients and staff, shout things like 'baby killer,' and are generally very threatening."

Founded by fundamentalist Randall Terry, 29, Operation Rescue "is definitely the most rambunctious group on this side," agreed Rachel MacNair of Feminists for Life of America, a Kansas City, Mo., based Right to Life group.

"I don't know why he chose that particular group," Kerry McNulty, a spokesman for the Ann Arbor, Michigan-based firm said of Monaghan's gift to Operation Rescue, speculating it was "out of personal convictions."

Monaghan himself could not be reached for comment.

Operation Rescue spokeswoman Barb Magarra was grateful for the gift, but said group members didn't need it to continue "to put their bodies on the line to intervene in stopping the premeditated murder of preborn children and the exploitation of American women."

While Magarra agreed colleagues might be disturbed by the group's tactics, she compared them to "those used by Martin Luther King and Gandhi. The pro-death people are in a rage because our tactics are effective."

And while some students may boycott Domino's, Magarra said others are "taking semesters off to dedicate their time to rescuing. All college students in America are not left liberal feminist socialists."

The boycott itself has started slowly since NOW proposed it

Member of Ku Klux Klan interviewed

by Kristi Giles

The following interview was conducted on Sunday, March 5, 1989, in Jefferson County, Tennessee, with a current card-holding member of the Jefferson County district organization of the Ku Klux Klan. Upon the request of the source, all names, dates, and specific identifiable information has been withheld; however, the information has been checked for accuracy by the source.

Q: First of all, could you tell me how you initially became involved with the Klan?

A: "Well, in the start, I didn't really like what the Klan was doing around here. I remember when I was still in high school, my brother wanted to be a member. So, when he was old enough, he joined. I guess that's really how I got involved myself. I looked up to my brother, and I always have. So about six or seven years after I got out of school, I told my brother I wanted to get into the Klan."

Q: So you have been a member for several years, then?

A: "Yes, about 14 years now."

Q: Have you ever thought about getting out?

A: "I think everybody does at one time or another, but it's not ever done. If you're in something that you believe in, or something that you've been committed to for so long, you don't just quit. No-body would respect you for it."

Q: How did your family feel when you joined the Klan?

A: "Well, they didn't know for a long time. They knew my brother was in, but they didn't know about me for about a year and a half."

Q: How did they find out?

A: "I don't really know. It's a small place, and things get around, but I'm not really sure how they found out."

Q: Were they upset?

A: "My father wasn't. He had supported my brother when he joined. But my mother didn't like the idea too well."

Q: Why is that?

A: "My mother is a good Christian lady. She doesn't believe in some of the things that we stand for."

Q: Such as?

A: "Such as the white man getting what he deserves. [Blacks] have stolen a lot of what we were intended to get, and it isn't fair to the white man."

Q: So you don't believe in the equality of human beings, regardless of their race?

A: "[Blacks] have their place, and we have ours. We want them to remember to stay in their place."

Q: Where exactly is that place?

A: "Below the white man -- that's where they belong. But they keep forgetting that."

Q: So, basically, that's what the Klan does -- remind blacks to stay in their place?

April focuses on child abuse problem

from a Tennessee Department of Human Services press release

Nashville -- Commissioner Nancy-Ann E. Min of the Department of Human Services announced on April 7, 1989, that Governor McWherter has proclaimed April as "Child Abuse Prevention Month" in Tennessee. This year, The Kroger Company and Kraft, Inc. have combined efforts with the Department of Human Services to underwrite a public awareness campaign promoting child abuse prevention. Posters, pamphlets and door hangers will be available in Kroger stores at Kraft displays to give parents tips on child abuse prevention.

"Child abuse and neglect occurs in every segment of society," Min said. "Understanding the reasons child abuse and neglect occurs in families is the first step towards prevention. Both the public and private sector share the responsibility of promoting the awareness of child abuse and how to prevent it. I'm pleased that Kroger and Kraft are helping us to accomplish this goal."

Each year child abuse affects the lives of over one million children. In Tennessee alone there were over 20,000 reports of child abuse and neglect last year. Even though these figures are shocking, the National Center on Child Abuse and Neglect estimates that for every case of child abuse reported, two more go unreported.

Physical abuse, sexual abuse, emotional abuse and neglect are categories of child maltreatment found in families. Although we do not know what causes child abuse, we do know that many factors which may cause severe parental stress have a powerful effect on family life. This in turn may lead to a parent's lack of control and result in child abuse.

Fortunately, there are services available to victims and their families. Abusing parents can be helped. The Department of Human Services continues to place emphasis on the prevention of child abuse through funding such programs as:

1. Parents Anonymous -- offers prevention and treatment and hold weekly self-help groups in communication around the state for parents in crisis to share their experiences and recovery. Also, Parents Anonymous has a 24-hour hotline (356-6767) in Nashville, and 1-800-356-6767 outside of Nashville.
2. Exchange Club -- Is a civic club that has four Tennessee child abuse centers in Nashville, Jackson, Memphis, and Greenville. They provide community education, parent education classes and resource centers and also match volunteer families to sponsor troubled children.
3. CHAPS (Catholic Charities) - respite care program whereby anyone else who might meet the requirements to still apply as well as students who will turn 21 sometime during the next year.

Perhaps the biggest obstacle to living in Pearson's for some students is the cost. Standard housing (Copeland, Gamble, Davis) prices for next year are double: $1580 per year; private: $2,370 per year; meal plan is $1,815 per year. Costs for Lloyd rooms are slightly less.

Pearson's housing options include privates or doubles with a kitchen and bathroom, and 3 or 4 person suites. A ten-meal per week plan is required for $2835; 4-person suite $1760; 3-person suite: $2,075.

Wyatt hopes that students will be able to better meet the increased costs of rooms in Pearson's because of the meal plan break -- allowing students to budget for their own meals.

Both Allison and Wyatt feel good about the new policy and are hoping for a successful year of residence hall life. They have invested much time and energy into new process.

MC seniors report on I.S. in seminar

by M.A. Bristol

Maryville College, for the first time in 15 years, hosted the Tennessee Academy of Sciences Eastern Collegiate Division Student Seminars on March 31, said Terry Bunde, associate professor of chemistry.

According to Bunde, these meetings, held annually in the spring, "provide a forum for senior students to present research work in a seminar."

Five MC seniors gave oral presentations concerning the research from their Independent Studies (I.S.): Aelfraed Chiverton, "Flow Cytometric Cellular DNA Analysis as a Marker of Breast Carcinoma in Women;" Sabine Hutchison, "Comparative Study of Effects of Heavy Metals in Soils, After Application of Sewage Sludge and Cement Kiln Dust-Amended Sludge;" Angela Turner, "Synthesis of Phospholipid Sulfates for Hammett Chemical Shift Correlation Studies;" Mary Coleman, "Improving the Detection of Deception by Attending to Vocal Cues;" and Laura Brock, "The Relationship of Self-Esteem to Body Image in College Age Women."

Participation in the seminar each year is open to all students of the sciences, including the physical sciences, social sciences, mathematics, and computer sciences.

Three students representing Lee College, Lincoln Memorial University, and Roane State Community College also made presentations. All of those participating will have abstracts of their studies published on The Proceedings of the Tennessee Academy of Sciences.

Bunde said of the quality of the presentations, "They were typical student papers." He then added, "I think that Mary Coleman's and Laura Brock's were the best because they had already finished their I.S. and had already given oral presentations to the department."

He also said, "We [MC] are at an advantage, because we require I.S., other schools do not."

MC has not participated in these seminars in 10 years, due to the fact that the former contact person left over seven years ago. Bunde hopes, as the new MC contact, to see further student participation.

a parent can place a child in times of crisis and the parent can benefit from an intensive program for two weeks.

Recent efforts such as those taken by The Kroger Company and Kraft, Inc. to underwrite public awareness campaigns have resulted in a more accurate awareness of the severity of child abuse. Their initiatives helped to provide greater public awareness and funding for Child Abuse Prevention programs.

Concerned citizens and groups must also join together to address these issues through both volunteer work and advocacy services for children in their own community.

"Each of us, in our own place, in our own way, can do something about child abuse and neglect," Min stated. "The single most important decision is to get involved. Just one person can make a remarkable is. The second thing? Perhaps, she said to one zealous student, you should turn down the offer of a diamond from your husband-to-be, knowing where diamonds come from.

Or perhaps, said the economics professor, we should give up our personal money to set up a scholarship to bring a South African black to Maryville College to learn -- and to teach us.

Divestment may be a vital symbol and, collectively, a powerful force. But unless we go much, much deeper in our personal and corporate lives, aren't we living under "cheap grace" instead of "costly grace?"

MC Theatre and the Passion Play open with Moliere's Tartuffe

The MC Theatre and Smoky Mountain Passion Play open their Production of Moliere's Tartuffe tonight.

Besides being the first joint venture between MC Theatre and the Passion Play, there are several other differences in this production compared to other recent shows. The set for Tartuffe is the most elaborate to appear since the set for The Physicists in 1987. It has a black and white, checkered floor and large mirrored flats.

Another difference in this production is the addition of understudies. The role of Elmire, played by Rebecca Michaux who is associated with the Passion Play, is being understudied by MC Freshman Missy Pankake, who also plays Flipote. Pankake will perform Elmire in the April 21 show.

The play itself is a comedy about a man who takes a beggar into his home, and, in turn, the beggar usurps him as head of the household and convinces him to give him all of his money and marry his daughter to him.

Freshman Chris Varner, who plays the role of Cleante, said of the play, "This is a play that should appeal to a broad audience. This play has a mass appeal, is humorous, but still has a certain social commentary that you kind of need to pay attention to."

Freshman John Worth, who plays Damis, disagreed: "I think it's a silly little play, and it's supposed to be funny. Nobody is going to come see it, because they have never heard of it."

MC student actors have been afforded the opportunity of working with professional actors: Charles Reese in the role of Tartuffe, Tom Booker in the role of Orgon, and Michaux.

Director Frank Bradley's decision to cast non-students in three of the major roles caused some controversy.

Michelle Rudisill, a sophomore who plays Madame Pernelle, said: "I think the play does allow some experience with college actors, but there were, of course, problems with bringing in outsiders. Some of the parts could have easily gone to students."

The rest of the cast is as follows: Trish Lunsford as Dorine, Charlotte Borderieux as Marianne, Rees Cramer as Valere, Wes Milstead as Monsieur Loyale, Chris Milsaps as the Officer, Tom Anderson as Laurent, and Barbara Kummerow as Flipote's understudy.

Tartuffe opens April 14. It runs April 15, 21, and 22 with curtain-time for each performance set at 8:15.

Admission is free for MC students and CIV credit will be given for attendance.

Charles Reese and Missy Pankake rehearse for Tartuffe. Reese plays Tartuffe, and Pankake is understudying the role of Elmire.

Knoxville Symphony plans performance of Messiah

from a KSO press release

The Knoxville Symphony Orchestra (KSO) and the Knoxville Choral Society will present Handel's Messiah as a special Mother's Day Concert on Sunday, May 14 in the Tennessee Theatre at 3 p.m. KSO Music Director Kirk Trevor will conduct the concert. Tickets for reserved seating are five dollars each.

Trevor said that the Orchestra and Choral Society will be presenting the original orchestration of George Frederic Handel's masterpiece. Last year the KSO and Choral Society presented Mozart's orchestration of Handel's Messiah on Mother's Day.

Trevor said that "the Messiah is timeless and, of course, as popular now as when it was first written in 1741. Fascinating to me is that I find something fresh in it each time I come back to it, and I trust that the listener will experience the same exhilaration."

He added that his tempo on the work will be "energetic, fast, and full of life -- in keeping with contemporary performance practice."

Trevor said that although the Messiah is often performed during the Christmas season, "the masterpiece was conceived as an Easter work. The Messiah is not necessarily a mass or church work," he explained.

"It is an oratorio, or vocal story. We are very pleased to be performing the Messiah with the Knoxville Choral Society in the Tennessee Theatre during the spring season."

Trevor said that the music of Handel was revived during the 19th century by Brahms. "To present-day listeners, the appeal of Handel lies in his nobility, his unending melodic invention, and his dramatic expressiveness."

A German-born composer, Handel was a widely traveled man and enjoyed a favorable reputation throughout Europe. In 1726 he became a British subject.

Handel spent five years in Italy, where he composed some church music and Italian cantatas, but he was greatly influenced by the "new" Italian opera. He subsequently composed a string of operas, which became the rage in London, in which subjects from history or classical mythology were arranged in a sequence of arias designed for star singers.

In 1732, the Bishop of London's ban on acted performances of sacred subjects in the theatre obliged Handel to present a revival of his earlier dramatic spectacle, Esther, as an oratorio. He decided that the public had wearied of operatic artificialities and singers' squabbles, so he struck out in a new direction. In 1739 he produced the intensely dramatic Saul and the monumental Israel in Egypt with its innovative succession of massive choruses. In 1742, in Dublin, he first performed his Messiah -- which, after a rather cool initial reception in London the following, has been performed almost as a sacred rite from then on.

For additional information about the special Mother's Day performance of the Messiah on May 14, contact the Symphony Society office, 523-1178, Monday - Friday, 9 a.m.-5 p.m., 708 Gay Street, Knoxville, TN 37902-1785.

Dogwood Arts Festival gets off to a good start

by Krista Loy

The Blount County Dogwood Arts Festival got off to a grand, but rainy start, last Saturday.

Debbie Aikins, assistant co-chairman of this year's festival, said, "The weather really affected this year's [Dogwood] Drive opening. We had to scratch the band and get everything done, including the clipping of the ribbon, as quickly as possible."

This had little effect on participation in this year's events, however. In fact, in one event, the Townsend Art Show, there were so many people wanting to participate that several of them had to be placed on a waiting list.

"The number of artists wishing to show their works was just incredible," Aikins said. "There were so many artists wanting to show their work that the waiting list was a necessary measure."

Although community attendance of the Festival events has always been good, she expressed concern about the lack of MC student participation in these events. "I think we ought to do something to where more students here at MC would feel more interested in the Festival and would participate in the events," Aikins said.

Her solution to this problem is "to get them [students] to be a part of the Dogwood Arts Festival -- letting them have events at the college."

There are a few events scheduled to take place on campus this year: the Japanese Cultural Exchange, a cricket match, and the British-made car display.

Other events scheduled during this year's festival, include a tennis festival, a five-mile hike, and Children's Day at Midland Center, she said.

Aikins added, "We have such a good response for events that we repeat them again the next year. And even though the co-chairmen will get together and try to come up with new ideas, we generally don't have to -- the people get interested and create their own [events]."

This year marks the 10th anniversary of Blount County's Dogwood Arts Festival. "We had a big birthday party at the mall on Sunday," she added.

Cross country slated as new varsity sport

by Steve Hutton

In the spring of 1988, the Maryville College Athletic Department was looking to add another varsity sport to the program. They decided that the sport would be cross country and the coach would be Director of Campus Life, Leslie Nier.

"I was really interested in starting a cross country team here, so when the decision was made to have a team, I offered myself as a candidate for the coaching position," Nier said. Nier has been an avid runner for many years and has been actively involved in local road races and running clubs.

The responsibility of coaching a team along with her already hectic schedule will be a challenge. However, as she stated: "It will be a challenge I will enjoy very much."

As of now, there have been est in the program. The only committed male runner thus far is very promising, though. Sophomore Randy Petty transferred to MC in the beginning of the spring semester from Roane State. He is a Lenoir City resident and looks like a good prospect to do well in individual competition.

Freshman Carol Callaway has been the only female to show genuine interest.

The team will be funded by the school but will probably not hold any meets on campus in next year's fall season. They will travel to races in Tennessee, Kentucky, and North Carolina.

Nier is presently running with any interested students on Tuesday and Thursday afternoons. She asks that anyone interested in running cross country or just training with the team this spring contact her through the Office of Student Development.

The soccer team practices for their match this weekend against Berry College.

because he feels that the issues involved go beyond the idea of 'honor code' in the traditional sense.

"I really think that the issue goes beyond what traditional honor codes have grappled with [such as cheating]," Ferrin said. "I think that it goes to a respect for people of other racial, ethnic, geographic, and gender backgrounds."

With these general issues in mind, Ferrin wants to be "a partner in the discussion." He said that student input will be the crucial factor in whether or not an honor code is established.

"If it's going to work," he explained, "students have to buy into it. Students have to say, 'this is what we want. . . for our own development.'"

Ferrin would like to see a group of students concerned about the issues to form a task force which would gather student input and formulate specific ideas for the honor code.

"This task force would be very important to the future of this institution, Ferrin said, since an honor code could significantly affect MC's reputation in ways that perspective students, alumni, present students, faculty, and staff view the college.

Any students who have opinions or ideas on the subject of an honor code, please make your views known by contacting Ferrin or Dr. Sue Wyatt, vice-president of Student Development, or by writing a letter to the editor of the Echo.

in early March.

Some NOW organizers attribute it to being too busy organizing an early April pro-choice march on Washington, D.C., to get the word out to campuses about a boycott.

As of March 6, for example, groups at Arizona State University and the University of Missouri-Kansas City had not heard of the effort.

But the campus chapters of NARAL (National Abortion Rights Action League) at the universities of Texas and Illinois responded quickly to boycott calls.

At Goucher in Maryland, students are fanning out to spread the effort to neighboring John Hopkins and Towson State universities.

Texas-Austin campus NOW coordinator Danalyn Recer expected to have pickets out at nearby Domino's within a week of hearing about it.

"They get an enormous share of the campus market," Recer said of Domino's. "We could see an immediate effect."

At Connecticut College, where feminist groups were among the first to act on the boycott, "We have posters on campus asking students to support local pizza makers and giving their phone numbers," Muller reported.

Muller maintained that "We don't want to hurt the individual franchises. We want to pressure the parent company."

"I think it's unfair," the parent company's Hingst charged. "They (the boycotters) don't understand the franchise business. They're taking their argue-ment to the wrong place. The franchisees are individual businessmen."

Under such arrangements, local businesspeople buy equipment, supplies, signs and marketing help from the parent company, but own the local stores themselves. Hingst estimates that two-thirds of the nation's Domino's outlets are owned by local interests, not by Monaghan's parent firm.

"They should have thought of that before," replied Goucher's Sally Packard. "McDonald's speaks for all its outlets. Domino's does the same thing. Some of the profits from the franchise go back to Domino's. They have to take the consequences of their actions."

In fact, some franchisees agree.

"All Domino's stores are not necessarily in agreement with Monaghan's feelings or the donation to Operation Rescue," said Bryan Cole, manager of a New London, Conn., Domino's near the Connecticut College campus.

"The donation was personal," he added, "but the company name was involved. It was not appropriate."

Cole thought it was "too early to gauge the effect of the boycott" on his store. His business, he said, was "maintaining."

we think that a part of that purpose is keeping minorities in their place."

Q: You refer to 'minorities'. Does that mean that it is more than blacks that you intend to keep 'in place'?

A: "Yes. And even more than just minorities. We don't stand up for anything that keeps the area from growing. Really, it's like a job -- a job at keeping the place we live in in order. We're kind of like cops, except that we believe in action. We don't ... around our time. We use it."

Q: What type of background did you come from?

A: "Well, it was middle-class. My father worked at the post office, and my mother was a housewife. We weren't dirt poor or anything. We went to church on Sundays -- my uncle was a preacher, and my family was very Baptist."

Q: What kind of education did you have?

A: "I went to the public high school here, and then I went to Carson-Newman for three semesters. Then I quit college to work."

Q: What kind of work do you do now?

A: "I'm a supervisor at a construction company."

Q: Do you have a family of your own?

A: "Yes. I'm married, and we have two kids, a boy who is three and a girl who is four-months."

Q: How do you feel that, if someday, your children discovered that you are a Klan member, it would affect them?

A: "I hope that they would be proud of it. I am. If I wasn't proud of being in the Klan, I wouldn't be in it."

Q: Then you condone the activity which the Klan has been accused of in the past, such as the torture and the beatings?

A: "I can't judge why those things were done, because I wasn't there -- I don't know what the circumstances were that led up to it. If our organization here ever were involved in something like that -- and they haven't been since I have been in -- I would certainly be for it if there was sufficient reason behind it."

Q: What would the Klan consider "sufficient reason" for beating or torturing another human being?

A: Being out of place, for one -- moving in where they don't belong. Or, saying things that should not be said."

Q: Does that include Klan members who break the code of secrecy?

A: "Most definitely."

Q: What made you decide to speak to me today?

A: "For one, because I'm not ashamed of the Klan, or that I am a member. Another, because I trust [name withheld] and I know that he wouldn't say something about me being here. He told me that there would be no names and no tapes. If there was, I wouldn't be here."

Q: So I take it that the code of secrecy that I have read about is a very important part of being a Klan member?

A: "It's what it's all about. The code is a matter of trust between the members. If you don't have trust, there can't be any kind of relationship to begin with. We're all like brothers in our organization. We don't accept new members unless we are sure that they can be trusted."

Q: How many new members do you accept each year?

A: Well, for one thing, no one comes to us. We go to them, and then only if we know that they have sincere interest. The man we accepted last summer, we had known for a long time -- we had all grown up together. So, when he began to express interest, we made it known to him that we knew where he could go, and he could go to join."

Q: So even membership is secretive?

A: "Yes. No one around here is ever sure who's in or who's not in. So when somebody wants to be in, it's a long, difficult process that can take months."

Q: Do you think that this is something that you will be in for life?

A: "As long as I'm here, and as long as the organization stays strong in Jefferson County, I stay in the Klan."

Q: Do you feel that the books and articles written over the years about the Klan, including the critically acclaimed film "Mississippi Burning," have been successful in portraying Klan members as they actually are?

A: "No, they don't. They make us look like a bunch of psychos. We're just normal people. Other people can't accept that we're for, that we're too bad. We have principles and we can't change what we believe just because there are some people that don't like it. It's our right to believe what we want."

Q: Any closing statements or comments that you would like to make?

A: Just that the Klan is not a terrorist group that everybody wants to think we are. They may have gotten out of hand some times, but lots of groups make the headlines -- it's news. It looks interesting in print, but half of what is said about the Klan is stretched to look that way. We are an organization just like any other. We dress differently, and we annoy the hell out of a lot of people, but we can be proud of the fact that we're doing something -- that we're not sitting on our asses waiting for the government or whoever to do it. We're out there cleaning things up when other people back away from the situation. We're talkers, we're doers."

Spring Fling slated

by Jennifer Danner

May 6 is a week away, so get ready. May Madness and Spring Fling are coming soon.

Originally the Highland Games were going to replace May Madness, but Leslie Nier, director of Campus Life, decided that there was too much history involved to give it up.

Nier explained that when she was an MC student, May Madness was known as the Mother's Day Riots, and one of the two events was to throw one's fellow students into a mud-hole created over by Copeland. The other event was to stay well hidden in one's closet.

From that spontaneous, unplanned event came May Madness which became more and more structured and included an obstacle course, a three legged race, a sack race, etc.

Nier said, "That's kind of where we are now. Yes, we'll probably do the traditional tug-of-war over a mud-hole -- that's what's carried over from the history of the Mother's Day Riots."

After everyone clears the mud-hole and cleans up, the scene will be moved to the Airport Hilton. Spring Fling, the last, big social event of the year, which starts at 9:00 p.m. and lasts until 2:00 a.m., will have the Unity providing the music.

The dance will be on the formal side of semi-formal (i.e. no t-shirts or jeans), there will be 15 ounce hurricane glasses as souvenirs, and the Hilton will supply a cash bar for those over the age of 21. Please don't bring your own alcohol.

The cost will be $3 for singles and $5 for couples. Both Nier and Junior Davey Reed, who works in Student Programming, have promised tons of food and soft drinks, as well as lots of fun.

All faculty, staff, and students are invited.

The Flying Thunderbirds entertained crowds at McGee-Tyson Airport on April 15 as part of the Dogwood Arts Festival.

L.A. Law inspires more law school applicants

by Jake Gaffigan

CPS -- An unprecedented number of college seniors are trying to get into law school, various campuses report.

While no national numbers are available so soon after the April 1 deadline many schools impose for applications, individual law school admissions officers almost without exception say they've received far more applications for the 1989-90 school year than for other years within memory.

"We've had a 40 percent increase over last year," said John Friesman, admissions director for the University of Vermont's law school, "and last year we had a 22 percent increase over the previous year."

At Drake University Law School, Dean David Walker reported, the number of applications has increased 60 percent over the number he got last spring.

Nationwide, 18.5 percent more students took the Law School Admissions Test (LSAT) this year than in 1987-88, the Law School Admissions Service (LSAS) said.

The boom, moreover, comes after a 12-year decline in the number of students wanting to go to law school, noted LSAS spokesman Bill Kinnish.

He attributes it to a number of factors, not the least of which is the popularity of the L.A. Law television show.

"The first factor contributing to the boom is image," Kinnish said. "There was a lot of publicity, bad press and articles about the glut of lawyers during the decline. Now we have L.A. Law and other activities that brought the law to the forefront."

Kinnish isn't the only law school admissions director to thank L.A. Law for students' increased interest in the field.

"That's an impression that various admissions officers have stated, but it's unsubstantiated," observed Ted Hulbert of the University of California at Los Angeles' law school, which is wading through a record 5,607 applications for 325 openings in next fall's first-year law class.

Seniors prepare for graduation

by W.K. Layne

With the week of comprehensives behind them, seniors are looking forward more than ever to graduation.

Commencement is set for Sunday, May 14 at 2:30, but many other activities besides this final ceremony are set for the weekend of May 11-14.

During this four-day period, alumni of graduating classes from years ending in four or nine -- starting with 1929 and going all the way to 1984 -- will also be honored.

The weekend officially begins on the evening of Thursday, May 11 when the Alumni board will welcome the seniors to the ranks of alumni. This reception will be held at 7:30 in Willard House, and all seniors are urged to attend.

On Friday and Saturday, May 11 and 12, alumni will have various opportunities to reunite with their former classmates. Saturday's events will culminate with the Annual Alumni Banquet beginning at 6:30 p.m. in the Margaret Ware Dining Room in Pearsons Hall.

The program following the banquet dinner will include elections of officers and members of the Alumni Association's Board, presentations of alumni citation awards, a speech by President Richard I. Ferrin, and a performance by the MC Concert Choir.

On Sunday, the Baccalaureate ceremony is being held at 10:30 in Wilson Chapel. The guest speaker will be Elizabeth B. Knott, MC alumna of the class of '59. Knott is an elder in the Presbyterian church and serves as Executive Presbyter of the Alaska-northwest Synod. She will also be receiving a citation award at the Alumni Banquet.

Another year ends!

The end of another academic year is approaching. So much has changed around here in the past nine months. The year started off with swarms of unknown freshman faces looking lost, new faculty faces looking almost as lost, and those old familiar faces looking great after a summer of not seeing them.

Over the course of the year, we have seen a new alcohol policy implemented that will probably be around long after each of us has graduated; some of us voted in our first presidential election; we have hopefully become more aware of the problems of Apartheid and homelessness; we have had old relationships grow and change and created new ones -- it has been a very busy year.

As finals week approaches and we all make that last ditch effort to get prepared for them, let's not forget to take stock of what we have learned this year -- not just out of books or from classes but about ourselves and those around us. How have we grown as people?

We have survived another year of academia, including those horrendous term-papers and exams and those all-nighters that it took to prepare for them.

Seniors, as you leave us, I hope you leave with happy memories of your college careers. Try to remember what you were like as a freshman -- how much have you changed and why and how?

It has been a fast and furious year, but amid this fury, we have accomplished a great deal.

Congratulations! You've made it. And you've earned it.

Gore examines the question of the ozone, pollution

by Al Gore
U.S. Senator

Washington -- More than 120 nations, as different as China and Costa Rica, as different as the United States and India, gathered at an international conference recently because of one very important similarity: concern for the environment we all share.

The United States was represented at the conference, and I was proud to be a part of our delegation. The issues that dominated our discussions -- the chemicals tearing at the earth's ozone shield and the consequences of their continued use and emission, cast a shadow here at home.

Global environmental change -- from global warming (the greenhouse effect), to destruction of the ozone layer -- are among the most important issues in America's future. They aren't bad science fiction movies. Unfortunately, they are real. Our future, our children's future -- the quality of life we enjoy today and that we will enjoy tomorrow -- is really what we're talking about when you cut through the scientists' complicated language and the alphabet of chemicals involved.

In a classic experiment, a frog dropped in boiling water jumps out. The same frog put in the water before it is slowly boiled remains in the pot. We're like the frog being heated slowly. We don't think about today and tomorrow, this week and next. Our environment is at the boiling point. Will we react?

We know what to do. It's no longer a great mystery. The problem is, there are too many who don't want to believe there's a problem or face up to the solutions. What's happening now is unlike anything we've ever seen. The anticipated problems of the future and the real problems of today are completely beyond anyone's experience. We have to adopt a new way of thinking and recognize our very relationship with our planet. Uncertainty cannot become an excuse for indifference or inaction.

Eight years ago, I held the first Congressional hearings on these issues of global warming and, in a long series of hearings since, I have watched them become the most serious environmental problems we have ever faced. I am deeply committed to these issues and believe strongly that they must be given highest priority. Not only must we put them on our agenda, we must reserve for them a spot at the top of our agenda.

Which is why, on the very first day of official Senate business, I introduced the World Environment Policy Act of 1989, a comprehensive, far reaching bill aimed at confronting these issues with the planning and policies needed to change the course of environmental history.

It is my hope that this bill will help us develop national and international policy responses to world environmental problems by controlling the chemicals and gases destroying the ozone shield, by presenting a comprehensive plan to promote recycling and reduce solid wastes, by providing new, innovative efforts to protect the world's forests, control soil erosion, and confront the very real problems of overpopulation.

For example, I'm proposing the fastest phase-out possible of chlorofluorocarbons, or CFC's, the chemicals in our automobile air conditioners and refrigerators and some foam insulation that's destroying the stratospheric ozone shield that protects us from the sun's dangerous ultra-violet radiation.

My bill would create a program to examine alternatives to recycling, a clearinghouse for information on existing, successful recycling programs, and a national recycling education program. Five years after enact-

Student angered by trash defacing the amphitheatre

by Jim Rice

Anyone been down to the amphitheatre lately? Or, should I say, anyone been down there that has been sober enough to notice the beer bottles, cans, and other assorted paraphernalia lying around? If so, then you can obviously tell that the nice woodsy, outdoors feeling has been replaced by a landscape of "Early Landfill." Unfortunately, this is only a start. Litter of all types is beginning to fill the campus, and not just in the form of junk mail from different organizations placed in our P.O. Boxes.

America at one time was large enough to accommodate all of the used tin cans that the people could churn out, so it was not as necessary to worry about junking up the country. In this day and time, however, the population has grown to the point that anything cast away affects the others in the environment. All the offal thrown from car windows supplies fellow travelers with a view of the landscape, sponsored by "Black Label Beer (Serve before Tuesday)." But the roads of our area are not the backyards of the litterers, nor are they the favored stomping grounds. Yet we as students of this institution leave beer bottles and junk as if it were a landfill, literally.

Worse yet, the college woods are one of the few bastions of nature that are close, and the only one on the campus itself. Many people go there to relax and unwind from stressful days. Simply getting back to nature is one of the best therapies for stress, and the amphitheatre could be a wonderful place, with the stream gurgling in the background. Unfortunately, this can't happen. Sunday mornings are one of the best times for walks before brunch, but one usually finds still-smoldering remains from a fire and Bud bottles around.

We need to consider the environment itself. Already, through our culture of smoke-belching industry and poison-pumping automobiles, we should have the death of many, many trees on our consciences. But when we litter, it is a direct affront against nature, taking away the beauty and leaving a spoiled paradise behind. It is NOT our right and privilege, and any readers that think so are probably so self-centered that this commentary will not reach them (But, fortunately, there self-centeredness will also hopefully prevent reproduction as well).

Is it too much to ask that people tote out the bottles and cans from the night before? Yes, someone will come along and clean it up eventually, but is that the highest priority of the staff of this college? I think not. They did not bring in the litter, and they should not have to be babysitters, cleaning up the messes of students. We are college students, and if we can't keep our bottles, cans, and cartons in the trash can, then my only recommendation is remedial nursery school. Let's try to take care of our environment, show it some respect, before we are inundated by cans, cartons, condom-boxes, cars, and other things that show we forgot to take out the garbage.

Students have left a trail of beer cans and other trash at the amphitheatre.

Say Anything is a fresh, new comedy that says something

by Jennifer C. Worth

The ads promise, "Say something... smart," "Say something... funny," "Say something... painful." The movie Say Anything does all three.

Say Anything is a rare comedy because it's humor is witty and offbeat rather than conventionally funny. It is not a zany laugh-a-minute film and so may not be for all comedy buffs. It will probably, however, make you laugh in ways you don't expect.

The movie is at its best when balancing that wit with a serious plot about a father-daughter relationship and how this affects her other relationships. At times, one side or the other dominates, so the movie becomes occasionally too light or too plotty. This is a minor flaw, however, and it doesn't serve to make Say Anything a bad (or even mediocre) film. Rather, it only keeps this movie from being truly great.

The cast is almost flawless. John Cusack is at his best as Lloyd Dobler, a genuinely nice guy whose only ambition in life is to be happy. Cusack's knack for timing, combined with Lloyd's tendency towards nervous chatter in tense situations, makes for some truly hilarious moments.

Ione Skye plays Diane Court, the beautiful and intelligent girl Lloyd falls for. She complements Cusack's Lloyd perfectly. This character could easily have been played as the kind of two-dimensional "priss" her classmates see her as, but Skye makes her a real person, not a teen-movie stereotype.

Say Anything is one of a new breed of romantic comedies aimed at a younger audience; those films have discovered that well-rounded, realistic characters are ultimately more enjoyable than cardboard clichés, because they are more interesting. They have also proven that well-worn teen-comedy conventions (the graduation party, the family dinner, etc.) can be used to good effect, with a refreshing approach and good scripting.

New recycling implemented

OCR -- Whether it's out of concern for shrinking landfill space or simply a good way to raise a little money, growing numbers of colleges and universities have turned to recycling.

"We're deluged with requests for information on how to get recycling programs started -- they've been coming in at more than 100 a week," said one Reynolds Metals Co. official. Aluminum, industry officials say, is currently the most profitable material to recycle. Prices vary across the country, but a pound of aluminum is worth, on the average, 50 cents. Many schools are also recycling high-grade paper, glass, and newspapers.

Motivated by increased student pressure, the University of Illinois recently approved a comprehensive paper recycling program estimated to cost some $680,000 over the next five years. Two coordinators -- one working through the physical plant and the other through the residence halls -- will be responsible for "provoking" people to voluntarily support the program and deposit paper products in specially marked containers. Containers have been placed on each floor of all campus buildings, including the residence halls. The University of Toronto also recycles paper, and has more than 60 bins strategically located throughout the campus.

Northern Illinois University's unique recycling program (glass, paper, aluminum) promotes community involvement and strengthens public relations at the same time. Volunteers pick up recyclables set at curbside by local residents.

McCleod wins award for Outstanding Senior

by Jennifer C. Worth

This year's Alumni Association's award for Outstanding Senior went to Lissa McCleod.

McCleod's goals for the future are definite but not specific: "My overall goal in life is making some meaningful contribution in society." She wants to work towards "a more just society."

Her activities during college have reflected these goals; she has been actively involved in the Peace Education Task Force, Amnesty International, the Student Anti-Apartheid group, the Blount County Literacy Program, and the Knoxville Area Committee on Central America. She has also written for the Highland Echo and sung soprano for the MC Choir, this year serving as its president.

"I see my plan of life as being very flexible," she said. "I just don't want to have my life mapped out."

She would like to spend some time living in a developing country and, eventually, go back to school. She also hopes to pursue the musical interest that has led her to pursue a fine arts degree in music; as a pianist, she said she would like "to explore jazz and improvisational music."

Her college experience has been a rich one. For one thing, she has learned that "Education is really important as a way to empower people." Among the high-points of these years, she includes the summer she worked for a housing repair program in Appalachia, which she probably would not have heard about if she had not come to MC.

In addition, "Recitals were a definite high-point," she said. In fact, she compared the awards banquet to the feeling after a recital: "It's a type of high." Then she added, "But I didn't work as hard -- I hadn't built up for it."

As for the award itself, she said, "I have mixed feelings. It's nice to be recognized for your achievements, but at the same time, it puts people's achievements on the wrong level. . . . In the utopian world, there's no need for these awards."

Lissa McCleod received the Alumni Associations Award for Outstanding Senior for her many achievements during her four years at MC. Jim Rice

First case to test Hazelwood arises

CPS -- The former publisher of California State University-Los Angeles' (CSULA) student paper said March 24 she would sue the school, claiming she had been fired for running stories that criticized campus President James Rosser.

In what promises to be the first major court test of 1988's landmark "Hazelwood decision," Joan Zyda, fired last April, said she would file suit for damages and to get her job back.

The school fired Zyda after months of squabbling, set off by a 1987 award-winning story in The University Times of the death of a CSULA student in a campus building wrecked by an earthquake.

The dead student's parents, using facts from the University Times' story filed a $5 million wrongful death suit against the school, claiming the administration was negligent in not quake-proofing the building.

"Pressure on Zyda increased with the lawsuit. They [the administration] accused her of 'negative journalism,' of everything but what was really on their minds," said Barry Fisher, Zyda's lawyer.

Administrators also objected to "editorials and cartoons criticizing CSULA President James Rosser and his aides for impeding the free flow of information," Zyda conjectured.

But CSULA spokeswoman Ruth Goldway said at the time of the firing that administrators were upset that the paper was losing money and dissatisfied with Zyda's performance.

"When I suggested that the university buy ads [to support both the paper and the mission of the university], Rosser declined unless he was given certain controls over the paper's content," Zyda said.

She maintained Rosser wanted to control the paper, if only to minimize CSULA's legal liability for what it published.

In the weeks after the U.S. Supreme Court's January, 1988, "Hazelwood" ruling, which gave high school principals the right to control the editorial content of papers run as for-credit class-

LA Law from page 1

Washington, D.C., also thinks TV might have inspired some seniors to consider a law career, although she cites a different show.

"Washington is a very hot place to study law since the Iran-Contra hearings," Upton said.

Upton and others quickly add students seem to be responding to influences more substantial than mere images, too.

Kinnish, for one, said many students mention how lucrative law can be as their motive for applying to law school.

Students, Kinnish said, "spend a lot of money over their three years of law school, and they have to expect that there will be economic opportunities at the end of those three years."

Some top law firms in New York, Chicago, and Los Angeles start some new lawyers at as much as $75,000 a year.

Kinnish and Upton both speculated that some students who in the past may have gone to med school are opting for law school instead. "You can bootstrap a law profession a lot easier than a medical profession," Kinnish added.

The boom, however, can strain law schools' ability to teach more students.

Vermont, which like many schools accepts more students than it can handle because it assumes some of them ultimately will enroll elsewhere, severely overtaxed its resources when it found itself with 30 more students than it could handle in its 1988-89 first-year law class, Friesman said.

In response, Vermont capped its first-year enrollment at 150 for 1989-90, but the number of applications rose anyway.

"The harder it is to get in," Walker said, "the more people want to come here."

Walker said students seem to rely on image for which school, as well as which profession, to choose. Many students, he explained, equate a school's quality with its entrance requirements. Though schools that are hard to get into aren't always good academically, Walker said raising admissions standards nearly always raises demand for the school.

"We've quite consciously taken advantage of the surge by being more selective," he reported.

Highland Games are success

by Jennifer Danner

On Saturday, April 22, the McRenobs, the McClouds, the McDLT's, and the McWhos all dressed in red, plaid kilts met on the field by Highway 321 and engaged in such activities as the caber toss, putting the stone, the kilned run, the weight throw, and the sheaf (not sheep) toss.

The first Highland Games turned out to be an exciting event in fine Scottish style complete with Scottish costumes, Scottish games, and Scottish music, which was played by Freshman Jamie Latimer on the bagpipes. There were some unvictorious heroes such as Freshman Martin Capetz, who literally passed out of third place in the kilned-run from hyperventilation, and there were some much admired victors like Senior Dean Walsh who was declared the owner of the bonniest knees by the blindfolded Dr. Sue Wyatt, vice-president of Student Development, who is quoted as having said, "Are you sure those are your knees?" and, "I hope this was as good for you as it was for me."

At the end of the day, the McClouds, led by Mark Humphries, was declared the best overall clan of the Highland Games. Davey Reed summarized the day, "It was fun," he said, "and we had a good time."

Leslie Nier, director of Campus

Life, explained that she had originally planned the Highland Games to be a replacement for May Madness with the addition of a bit of heritage and class, but she added, "That probably was not a good decision because there has been a certain history that has been involved with May Madness."

She was, however, pleased with the Highland Games. "I'm going to try to make that apart of the Dogwood Days on campus and try to go ahead with the games."

"The essence of the suit is the retaliatory firing of Zyda for her stories on the earthquake and the questions about the administration's culpability (in the death of a student)," Fisher said.

CSULA Vice-President and General Counsel Mayer Chapman would not comment on the lawsuit because, "We haven't been served. We think there's some manipulation of the media going on. We've gotten 20 calls, but we haven't seen anything."

Guillaume teaches self-defense class

by Steven Lantrip

A self-defense program was conducted Tuesday night by Bruce Guillaume, director of the Life Enrichment Center, and several of his karate students. This program emphasized a hands-on approach to self-defense.

Participants, with the help of Guillaume, identified weapons that everyone naturally possesses such as the head, hands, elbows, knees, and feet. Then they identified natural target areas: the eyes, nose, throat, groin, and any joints such as the shoulder, elbow, and wrist.

Participants, with the help of the instructors, practiced defending themselves through several techniques. As far as defending one's self from an attacker with a weapon, like a knife or gun, Guillaume suggested that the best thing to do is exactly what the attacker says to do because a person would be unable to defend himself with the skills learned in an hour-long self-defense program.

We'll be watching a to-be-announced science fiction movie in the "Good Times" Room. Don't miss a chance to be involved. And remember: "No matter where you go, there you are."

** Prize money totaling $2,500 will be awarded to college photography students in a creative photo contest being conducted by the Centennial Pay Phone Committee. No restrictions are placed on the composition or presentation as long as a pay telephone is included in the shot. Entries must be submitted by May 30 to Pay Phone Centennial Photos, 3721 Briar Park, Suite 100, Houston, TX 77042.

** Community Issues and Values (CIV) will look a bit different next year. Academic credit may still be earned, and any attendance credits earned this year may be applied to next year's program. We are hoping that fewer events will mean higher quality for the coming year: there will be seven programs each semester, including Convocation on September 7 and Founder's Day on October 19 in the fall, and Convocation and February Meetings in the spring. Programs will be built around the theme of "The Spirit of Revolution," inspired by the bicentennial of the French Revolution, which is being celebrated this year.

And at the Community College of Allegheny's Allegheny campus, proceeds from aluminum recycling finance a book scholarship fund for students in times of emergency. This semester, two students received emergency grants.

While recycling has the potential to make money, many efforts in fact do not, said Donald Wendel, University of Illinois vice-chancellor. "They're not producers of revenue -- not in our community anyway," he says. More important to UI, Wendel said, is the fact that recycling helps avoid costs. Because the local landfill is closed, the university has to pay to haul waste 30 miles to the nearest dump site -- an expensive process. "Recycling reduces the volume of waste material," he said, "so that over a four-year period, the costs avoided will be equal to the amount of money we spent implementing the program."

But getting the campus to "think" recycling is a different matter, said Allegheny's Samuel Mangieri. "Educating faculty, staff, and students about recycling is a long-term process. Even though we're pulling in some money, our recycling containers have also become a favorite place to dump trash."

If money is the only objective behind a recycling program, schools should have individual clubs solicit materials, not rely on people to deposit them in the proper receptacles, Mangieri says. "You need a group that will canvas the campus."

John VanDevender, spokesman for Aluminum Co. of America (ALCOA), agreed. To succeed at recycling, "convenience is everything. You have to make it easy for people to donate; you can't make them work. You need someone to collect the materials and take them to a central location; one person per residence-hall floor, for example. And, put signs and containers near the vending machines."

There's money in recycling, VanDevender said, "but you need everyone's cooperation."

ALCOA will send information and resources to schools interested in developing recycling programs. Reynolds has similar information outlined in its comic book, "Michael Recycle."

Bunde named Tenn. Teacher of the Year

by Christen Anderson

Chemistry professor Terry Bunde has become the first MC faculty member to receive the Tennessee Teacher of the Year Award. Winning the competition came as a surprise to Bunde, who was not aware that Dean Boldon, academic vice president, had submitted an application for him.

"I don't know what I did to win," Bunde said. "There are lots of professors who are equally if not more deserving of this award."

A highpoint for this 12-year MC educator was the support of his former students, who wrote letters to CASE (Council for the Advancement And Support of Education) praising Bunde. He felt this was the most rewarding aspect of receiving the award.

Bunde, who teaches organic chemistry, bio-chemistry, spectroscopy, Science 250, introductory science for psychology, P.E., and nursing students, claims the day to day interaction with students is his favorite part of teaching.

"I watch students develop, become professionals, and go on to become successful -- I derive satisfaction from thinking I had a part in that," he said.

Bunde says that Science 250 is his favorite class to teach. "I enjoy teaching science from an ethical, moral, and political point of view to non-scientists," he explained. "I learn as much as the students do, and by changing topics often, discussing acid rain, toxic waste, and AIDS, I can maintain my enthusiasm for the class."

According to senior English major John Rhoades, "Professor Bunde's class is challenging, in a different sort of way. We English majors are accustomed to discussions in our humanities classes, not science classes. Professor Bunde's not afraid to explore any angle of the issues we discussed in class -- he's very versatile."

"He's always willing to talk with students after class," added senior Craig Canevit. "He also remembers his students a year later."

MC Phone Home

by Jeff Huffman

Beeeeeeeeeep! Beeeeeeeeeep! Beeeeeeeeeep! Ah, the sound of the touch tone phone has filled each and every dorm room in MC. The school has finally installed its very own phone system. Now each student can call a friend, a parent, a pizza place, or even Switzerland from the comforts of their own dorm. No longer do you have to make a trip to the pay phone and call your parents collect. No longer do you need to beg for quarters as if you were a video junkie.

The system didn't just suddenly appear at MC. Research began on the possibility of a phone system over 15 months ago. Installation began in July, and the official switchover to the system took place August 12. The entire system totaled to a cost of around $235,000. But where is the brain of this new system? It's on the second floor of Anderson Hall. Inside a huge panel is the switchboard which is totally independent of any other phone system.

Can New Food Service Take the Heat?

by Christen Anderson

Noticed a change in the cafeteria food lately? Marriott has joined MC, taking over food service responsibilities from Morrison's. Ken Smith, the Food Service Director, is a three-year veteran of Marriott and along with Unit Manager Mindy Barnett, has developed numerous plans to revamp both the cafeteria and Isaac's.

"We're initiating a new Beta scanning system for students' ID cards that will speed up the cafeteria lines and also allow students the option of eating at Isaac's if they have late classes or work conflicts," Smith explained.

The new cash equivalency program at Isaac's allows students to purchase their choice of food items from a limited menu one hour after regular weekday cafeteria hours. Other improvements to the cafeteria include new Coke machines, cereal dispensers, a self-serve deli, dip ice cream, trendsetting food items such as pizzarino sandwiches, and menu boards that include nutritional information.

"We'll also be having steak and seafood night once a month, picnics for special occasions, in addition to pacechangers such as a baked potato bar, taco bar, nacho bar, and cupcake bar," added Smith.

Smith plans to extend his innovative plans to include Isaac's. The snack bar will be offering items such as pizza, frozen yogurt, and freshly-baked muffins and sweet rolls.

"We also want to keep Isaac's open later to show movies or popular sporting events," Smith said.

The new food administration hopes to overcome the problems of food variety and customer satisfaction by developing a six-person food service committee, made up of representatives from each dorm, the dean of students, and commuter students. The committee will meet once a month to discuss menus and to present constructive criticism. Leslie Nier or Ken Smith should be contacted for more information on the food service committee.

Numerous food service job opportunities are available for students, including catering, cooking, customer service, dishroom, and maintenance work.

"There are many benefits of working with Marriott," explained Smith. "There is no travel cost, the location and hours are convenient, no experience is necessary, and most importantly, there's the opportunity for advancement with Marriott."

Near Grads Groomed for Future

Cole Piper, executive vice president and chief operations officer of Proffitt's, served as master of ceremonies at the senior luncheon Sept. 21.

The luncheon, a unique blend of alumni and near grads, was the kick-off of the many events to follow in the senior countdown. Appropriately, the focus involved the deadly first step into business -- the interview process.

Suited, groomed, and refined, the seniors gained pointers on a variety of subjects from proper napkin placement at a formal dinner to the latest fashion faux pas.

An enlightening presentation on proper etiquette was given by

New Faculty Full of Talent, Full of Promise

by Kathleen McArthur

Dr. Robert Greeney is the new assistant professor of physics. Last year he taught at Worcester Polytechnic Institute. His education includes a doctorate in physics from Clark University, a bachelor's degree in economics from Fordham College, and Peace Corps Service in West Africa. His family, which includes four children, is enjoying Maryville.

"What we like is the human scale of the college community and the physical nearness of everything," he said. "I feel very positive about the change; people are very active in their thinking in terms of education."

Dr. Lori Schmied is visiting Maryville College as a professor of psychology. She is a Phi Beta Kappa and holds a doctoral degree from the University of Tennessee, Knoxville.

When asked what she first noticed at Maryville College, Schmied said, "In a small college atmosphere, students are not only more open about themselves but more open to learning."

Patricia Miller has come to the College for one year as an instructor in nursing. Her education consists of a bachelor's degree in nursing from the University of North Dakota and a master's degree in adult education from the University of Tennessee, Knoxville. Miller was employed part-time with the college last year and is pleased to be here as a full-time instructor.

"I can better understand Maryville College's purpose and role in the community. I am convinced that the opportunities are here for students to get an excellent education," she said.

She will finish her master's degree in nursing at the University of Tennessee, Memphis.

Margaret Ribble is the new instructor in developmental mathematics. She graduated cum laude from Maryville College. As a previous interim instructor at Maryville High School, she finds two major differences in high school and college students.

"Motivation and the desire to learn seems greater [in college students], and I like the flexibility of the college and greater freedom in the classroom. Looser structure makes it easier to help students individually," she said.

Ribble is working on a master's degree in mathematics at the University of Tennessee, Knoxville.

Karen Gygli is the new theatre director and speech-theatre instructor. She graduated summa cum laude graduate from Ohio Dominican College, and received a master's in theatre from Bowling Green State University. Her recent move to the South has been a new experience.

"The first thing I noticed as soon as I got off the plane was the way people were talking," she said. "And the second thing was all the red dirt. That was just so strange to me! Overall, I am finding the people around here are really friendly, and that's nice."

Gygli is currently writing her dissertation in theatre for Bowling Green State University.

Margaret 'Peggy' Maher is an instructor in sign language interpretation. She returns to Maryville as a magna cum laude graduate of the college, and holds a master's degree in social work from the University of Tennessee, Knoxville.

Maher has a positive attitude about coming to the college as an instructor.

"I have felt really gratified to be able to come back to the first four-year program for interpreters, and to contribute to that program," she said. "I feel like I have come home again."

Her past teaching experiences include stints at Western Carolina University, Lenoir-Rhyne College and the Tennessee School for the Deaf.

Mary Kay Sullivan is the new assistant professor of management. She received a bachelor's degree in romance languages from the University of Arkansas and a master's degree in Italian language and literature from Bryn Mawr College. This semester she combines the role of student and instructor as she completes her dissertation at the University of Tennessee, Knoxville.

"It places incredible demands on my time, so I can empathize with the students. I can appreciate the demands on their time and the equal need for recreation," she said. "I know what it's like to have a hundred things due yesterday."

Sullivan has also been a Fulbright Scholar, a Woodrow Wilson Fellow, and a recipient of the 1988 Graduate Teaching Award in the College of Business at the University of Tennessee, Knoxville.

Affiliate Artist Named

by Sarah Sawyer

There are women with an electric flair; women who are vibrant in their very natures. Karen Beardsley is all of those things. Her performances are known for their vibrance, their life, their excitement.

Beardsley's most noted work would probably be her creation of the role of Max in Maurice Sendak and Oliver Knussen's "Where the Wild Things Are." The work was originally accomplished with the Glyndebourne Festival Opera in London, England. In 1987 the work was performed in concert fashion with the New York Philharmonic.

The 1989-90 season will be exciting for Beardsley. She will be performing "Daughter of the Regiment" with the Lyric Opera of Kansas City, "Where the Wild Things Are" with the Chicago Opera Theatre, the role of Adele in "Die Fledermaus" with the Austin Lyric Opera, and finally "The Ballad of Baby Doe" with the Spokane Symphony Orchestra. Included in her 89-90 season will be appearances and Informances at Maryville College in conjunction with the Affiliate Artists, Inc. program.

Affiliate Artists, Inc. is dedicated to bringing the fine arts to campuses all over the country by way of Informances. "Informance" is a trademarked term unique to Affiliate Artists, Inc. It is a combination of lecture and performance presented in a comfortable, interactive fashion that promises to keep the attention of even the most avid Bon Jovi fan. Beardsley's most recent Informance displayed both her talent and personality in a fashion befitting only a true artistic performer.

Student Publications Gain New Editors

by Jeff Huffman

Whenever you read a newspaper or magazine, do you ever wonder who was responsible for it? Probably not. But, nevertheless, these publications don't just materialize out of thin air for your reading enjoyment. There are some very busy people working to get these publications to you. Who are they? What do they want? Do they like pistachio ice cream?

These people are editors, or to be more formal, editors-in-chief. This year, the MC newspaper - Highland Echo, and the literary magazine - Impressions, will have new editors-in-chief. And just who are these people? Jana Dalton and Mark Koerber will take the reigns of the Echo. Noel Royer will be the big cheese for Impressions.

Jana Dalton, co-editor-in-chief, is also the editor-in-chief of the MC yearbook, The Chilhowean. You've probably run into her in the library or Fayerweather Hall, where she is rushing to get fifteen gazillion things done in one day.

Dalton chose to be co-editor-in-chief of the Echo because the school "needed a campus voice, which I think we really haven't expressed very much." Dalton was editor-in-chief of her high school yearbook, a staff writer for previous Echos, a contributing writer to Impressions, and created two newsletters. Dalton said that she "would like to make it (the newspaper) more modern" and will "fight to get an issue that everybody will be proud of." This year, the Echo plans to have at least 90% of the paper written and handled by students with the rest provided by AP news services. Dalton is currently working on a novel and has already published 15 or 16 poetic works.

Mark Koerber is also co-editor-in-chief of the Echo. He took the job because it was "a challenge, an opportunity to do something creative and have a chance to put some real input into the newspaper." Koerber was previously an editor of the Maryville Chamber of Commerce publications, and has participated in various other reporting jobs for companies. Koerber, who entered MC last year, emphasized that "the staff must have a vital effort in the paper. It's not my paper, it's not Jana's paper, it's the people who work on it." He added, "If there's no work; there's no paper." So what does he want the Echo to be? It must be "a catalyst to provoke thought and encourage action on important issues."

Noel Royer is the editor-in-chief of the literary magazine, Impressions. She took the job because she "enjoys reading poetry and prose." Royer was the poetry editor of her high school literary magazine for two years, and became assistant editor to Impressions. She became editor-in-chief last spring after returning from Japan. Royer said that this year, Impressions will have "better graphics." She said she would "do the best job possible for the magazine" and added that "each year we make mistakes, we learn mistakes, and improve for next year."

The editor-in-chief is a busy creature. If it were not for the support of staff and others, Dalton, Koerber, and Royer would be even busier. They plan to guide the student publications in the right direction towards improvement and learning valuable lessons.

Embryos in Court

by Jessica Roitman

Maryville, Tenn. has appeared as the byline for articles featured in both national and international newspapers and magazines over the past six months.

The cause of all this interest in our humble hometown was a divorce case between Mary Sue and Junior Davis, two former residents of Blount County. The dispute centered on whether Mary Sue Davis would be allowed to use any of seven embryos frozen and stored at Fort Sanders Regional Medical Center in Knoxville in her attempts to become pregnant.

Even though they are divorced, Mary Sue Davis wanted to use the eggs to try to have a child. Junior Davis opposed her, contending that he should not be forced to become a father against his will.

During their marriage, the Davis' were unable to have children "naturally" and as an alternative attempted in-vitro fertilization. In this type of procedure eggs are surgically extracted from the woman and mixed with the man's sperm in a lab dish. If all goes as planned and an embryo is formed, it is implanted in the mother's uterus. The procedure has a success rate of about 18%.

The case grabbed the attention of doctors, lawyers, medical ethics experts, philosophers, abortion activists (on both sides) as well as the general public because of the ethical questions it raised and the legal precedents it might set.

The culmination of the case came on Sept. 21st when County Judge W. Dale Young issued his 57-page decision. He ruled in favor of Mary Sue Davis, giving her temporary custody of the embryos. Young said, in part, that the embryos were already human beings and that the Davis' were already parents.

Junior Davis said he planned to appeal.

Amnesty Active at MC

by Jessica Roitman

Thousands of people around the world are in prison for their political and religious beliefs. These people are known as prisoners of conscience, and many are held without charge or trial. In many countries men, women, and children "disappear" after being taken into official custody. They are never seen or heard from again. Amnesty International is dedicated to gaining freedom for all prisoners of conscience regardless of nationality or race.

Amnesty International makes a policy of refusing to request the release of prisoners who have advocated violence or have used violent methods to achieve their goals. They will, however write letters demanding the reasonable and humane treatment of any prisoner of conscience. This policy lends credibility to the organization in the eyes of world governments and the general populace.

Amnesty set up a booth in the lobby of Fayerweather Hall and asked passing students and faculty to write letters to the governments of China and South Africa requesting the release of prisoners. By the end of the day over fifty letters had been written. Tom Anderson, President of the Maryville College Chapter of Amnesty International, said, "Not only did we get a lot of letters written, but I think we succeeded in making those on campus more aware of human rights abuses in the world and letting the students know that something can be done about these abuses."

If you are interested in learning more about Amnesty International or wish to become involved in the Maryville College Chapter, then contact either Tom Anderson, A.I. Chapter President or Karen Gygli, Faculty Sponsor.

The great success of Amnesty International comes from the fact that these countries receive letters making them aware that people in the rest of the world know that a person is being imprisoned in the nation for his or her beliefs. Most nations are extremely sensitive to international opinion and want to present a good image to the rest of the world. The desire for international approval makes a country more willing to listen to Amnesty members.

The Maryville College chapter of Amnesty International was founded last spring. Since the college chapter is a "Student Chapter," the organization does not "adopt" a prisoner. Instead, the members write letters on behalf of any prisoner who is in immediate danger of being tortured or killed.

The Maryville College chapter held an all-day Write-a-Thon on September 20 called, aptly enough, "International Peace Day."

Soccer Tourney Within Reach for Men

by Jana Dalton

The men's soccer team is running a fine line this season as they look toward a bid for the national tournament in October.

Their 6-4 record (as of this printing) is evidence of the struggle but Coach Pepe Fernandez is optimistic.

Now ranked 10th in the south, Coach Fernandez said the team has had to undergo a lot of changes. New this year to MC, he said, "it's been a big adjustment period," and he attributed the cause to the loss of key players and a new coach.

But he said, "They've learned a few new things, and I've learned some things."

As far as performance goes, the coach said it was tough and go at the year's start. The team was "really jumpy in the beginning of the season. You could never tell how we were going to play," he said.

But perseverance pays off. Their win over Lynchburg, never beaten by MC until now, was a boost and a turning point for the men.

Still the bid for the national tournament will be uphill all they way. The coach said it was a tough schedule with little room for error.

The make-or-break weekend is when the men confront Emory, ranked 6th, and Scranton, expected to be in the top ten by the time they meet the MC team in late October.

The coach praised his team's improvements and said he was "very optimistic" about the chance to attend the tournament. "Right now" he said, "I feel like we're starting to get on a roll...especially the last three games, we've played really well. I think we're in a position to put ourselves in position to play for a trip to the national tournament."

So the tournament hangs in the future, this year within reach.

Fighting Scots Continue to Battle

by Steve Williams

The Maryville College football team does have a winning spirit after all. The Fighting Scots traveled to Tennessee Wesleyan and won big.

With 15 first downs to Wesleyan's one, six of ten passes completed to Wesleyan's one of eight, and 400 yards gained on offense to Wesleyan's 39 yards, the Fighting Scots crushed Wesleyan 28-0.

Robert Cox led the Scots in rushing with 20 carries totaling 123 yards and two touchdowns. Keith Washington carried the ball 21 times for 75 yards. Zaton ran seven times for 51 and Shedrick McCall five for 17 yards and a touchdown.

Mike Wimpee, coming off a terrible game against Lander College, threw a touchdown pass to Corey Cheshire.

When asked how he felt about the team's attitude, Coach Fernandez said, "The team goes into every game with a winning attitude. They are out there doing the best they can and will continue to do so."

Ladies' Volleyball Finish 4th

by Lori Chambers

The Lady Scots volleyball team, with a 10-1 record, has recently been ranked second in the south by the NCAA Division III polls.

The Lady Scots Conference tournament was held September 22-23, and Maryville came out on top. Head Coach Kandis Schram and her team knew who the good teams were and played well when they needed to. It was "a chance to size up the conference," Schram said. "We dished it out, took it, and we won."

The Lady Scots held an invitational tournament September 29-30, and Maryville finished with a record of 4-2, fourth overall. This tournament enabled the team to compete against scholarship schools and to realize their own, true potential. The tournament was held on the Scots home territory which was really advantageous to the team.

The Lady Scots will head to Maryland on October 20-21 for another tournament which Schram termed a "do or die tournament." The top four teams in the south region will be there, including top-ranked Western Maryland, number two Maryville, third-ranked Bridgewater, and Eastern Mennonite.

Although the team is fairly young, Coach Schram says there is a high level of skill and expectation from the players. Freshmen on the team include Michelle Snyder, Nancy Simmons, Amy Hensley, Amy Harbin, and Leigh Ann Elliot. Four sophomores, Karen Dearth, Tonya DeWitt, Leslie Henry, and Jami Humphrey, add valuable talent to the squad. The only junior, Joni Harper, is also a starter. Seniors Peggy Lane and Karen Palka give the team leadership from their experience, skill, and consistency.

Soccer Isn't Just a Man's Game

by Skip Heverly

Those of you who like soccer but haven't had a chance to get to the games might want to start following the Women's Soccer team more closely. They have already won 6 of their 12 games, placing in two tournaments, and second year coach Jerry Litton is very confident that the team can reach their goal of 10 wins in their remaining 9 games.

In their first year as a recruiting team, the roster is heavily weighted with freshmen from all over the country, including Florida, Ohio and even Hawaii!

Coach Litton says the young team has worked very hard and is very coachable. With two redshirt freshmen and standout Beth Steigerwald sidelined until next season with a leg injury, the team's prospect for success next year is excellent.

Coach Litton (who has never played soccer himself but has 14 years coaching experience) says recruitment is proceeding nicely, and he stated his goal for next year - make the playoffs.

There will be a women's soccer tournament this weekend, starting at 2:00 with a game against Methodist College from North Carolina, the number one team in the south and the number four team in the country.

Let's support our very fine women's soccer team.

T.C. Talks

by Travis Crabtree

Everyone thinks that something is going on at the campus bookstore; I know that's what I suspected when I first started this column, but what I discovered gave me feelings of both relief and grief. The bookstore is no diamond in the rough; that much is for sure, but they are not solely responsible for the exorbitant prices of books either. The problem lies deep within the core of the textbook selection process, a process which vividly reveals what happens when bureaucracy goes unchecked and communication between faculty, publishers and the bookstore breaks down.

The entire muddled process begins in the offices of our esteemed faculty. A professor or a select brain-trust from each department searches long and easy to find that text which splendidly summarizes their entire life's work in about 200 pages. They make full exercise of their free wills (some wills are freer than others), and the mere mention of any outside assistance is immediately met with hostility and many eloquently stated defences in their behalf.

One department head smoothly proclaimed, "The faculty gets enraged if anyone tries to interfere in the process of choosing which books will or will not be used in the classroom." The head also stated (even more smoothly) that no short lists are ever considered.

From the high towers of academia, the process moves on to a brief stop at the Registrar's Office. There the number of texts that will be needed, a figure to which the bookstore has no access but depends on dearly, is "hypothesized" [sic] made up. And the hypothetical number is transferred to the bookstore.

According to Julia Rop, the ordering process is the real headache. You see, each publishing house has different ordering and shipping policies; you can't use one publisher's policies to determine another's. Also, the various publishers cloud up the process by continuing to churn out editions of books so they can raise prices with an apparently valid excuse (I guess that it helps them to sleep better at night.)

Finally, after countless procedural snags and endless five-hour days, the books arrive -- God-speed U.P.S. Now, the students can finally reap the rewards of the annual textbook harvest: high prices, different and new editions and oft-times, book shortages.

So, it seems clear that the bookstore is not solely responsible for the textbook mess that inevitably arises every year. And while it does have many obvious and discernable faults, the largest of which is the absence of used books, it is necessary to remember that the bookstore has no province over the greed of publishers or the contrariness of the faculty. Sure, go ahead and criticize the bookstore if it will make you feel better, but remind yourself that it is only one link on the rusty chain of the textbook crisis.

Freedom of Expression is the Issue

Somehow I never really got it, this idolatry for the flag. Maybe it was my Christian upbringing, which taught me that my fidelity was to more than the earthly symbols of man and his vain glories. Or possibly my respect for the Jeffersonian idea of independent thought and action free of government meddling makes me distrustful of jingoists who would have us rally round the flag.

So you can imagine my delight when even a conservative Supreme Court recognized the State's blatant attempt to regulate free speech and overturned sanctions against flag burning. My delight, however, was soon to turn to despair, for President Bush immediately sought to capitalize on this ruling for his law and order agenda.

Yet I really wasn't surprised over either of these events. The Supreme Court has consistently overruled the State's attempt to dictate what is free speech or its requisite, the freedom of expression. And Republican presidents predictably endeavor to make non-issues, like burning the flag, issues in an effort to obfuscate the pressing problems confronting the American people.

This, of course, is the conservative agenda: Tie Congress' legislative hands with sanctimonious debates over the nature of freedom and its constitutional guarantees, with tireless posturing over which party can produce the toughest (and most ineffective) anti-crime bill; meanwhile, real issues, like addressing the needs of the one-third of American children who live in poverty or the need 40 percent of us have for health insurance, are left unquestioned as the Congress wrangles over the Bush domestic agenda.

But what has this to say for the American political system? After all, Americans voted for then Vice-President Bush knowing that he wasn't actively going to pursue the liberal issues of day-care, public health insurance and protecting the rights of women and other minorities. Flag waving and glorifying in military might, it would seem, are what the majority of voting Americans are into. Thankfully, however, the Supreme Court upheld the minority opinion which understands that the State's protection of the flag underscores a xenophobia and jingoism which is inappropriate if Americans are to enter the 21st century as citizens of the world.

Whose Life is it Anyway?

by Jessica Roitman

A seed to a tree or a flower has the genetic blueprint of what it might become. The seed holds the possibility of life, yet no one cries if it is lost or thrown away or just doesn't grow. One would think the same would hold true for what is essentially a human seed - the frozen embryo.

Not true, according to Judge Dale Young, an embryo is a child, he says, and it must be treated accordingly. This is a little confusing to me, and I would like to pose a few questions to Judge Young in the hopes that he can help me out.

Is Mary Sue Davis obligated to attempt to give birth to all seven embryos? After all, what makes one embryo (excuse me - "child") more worthy of being given a chance at life than any other? Assuming that all her children survive, however, that leaves her a single mother of seven kids. Won't that be a burden on the social welfare system, Judge? Aren't we told that children of single parent families are emotionally damaged? Now we have the possibility of seven more. Isn't that nice?

If she had a child and decided to dispose of the other frozen "children" wouldn't that make her a murderer? Would she be an unfit mother if she decided to give away her little petri dishes of joy to another woman? After all, she is their mother and what kind of woman would give away her children?

Considering that in vitro fertilization only has a success rate of approximately 18%, isn't it inhumane to create all those little "lives" knowing that most of them won't survive? What about allowing deformed embryos to be disposed of before they are frozen? Shouldn't this be thought of as murder? Even freezing them could be dangerous, according to Young's ruling, since several of the embryos usually don't survive the thawing.

The case was decided in favor of the woman, but the implications of the decision make it possible for her to lose control of her own body and perhaps for all women to lose this cherished right. In the past our nation has given the rights of living, breathing people priority over those of fetuses and embryos. This doesn't seem to be the situation any longer. It's scary to contemplate a future controlled by the interests of eight-celled frozen embryos and judges from Blount County, Tennessee.

Commuter Lounge: Better or Worse?

by Kristi Giles

The Commuter Lounge underwent some unfortunate changes over the summer.

It has been the hope of commuter students for some time that a renovation of the lounge would take place, since those of us who make use of the facility frequent it quite often between free class periods. The Commuter Lounge was a place for study, for talking with other commuters, and for much-needed relaxation.

However, since its recent "improvement," the appearance of the lounge is more disastrous than before.

The commuter lockers were placed in the second-floor lobby, which made available space for the construction of new study carrels. These study carrels were built of wood that has obviously been used several times before. This gives the Commuter Lounge the look and feel of a vandalized neighborhood, complete with various signatures, drawings, and multi-color spots of paint. Since the carrels have taken away much of the area of the lounge, it appears much smaller and isolated than before the renovation occurred. Though the "before" look of the lounge was, needless to say, in definite need of a facelift, the design and improvements must be questioned.

The look of the lounge is not the only disappointing change on campus this fall concerning commuter students. The telephone in the Office of Student Development, accessible free of charge to commuters for local service, was removed. This makes it difficult for students that, for one reason or another, do not have the change to use the public phone and need to make emergency phone calls.

Commuter students should not be excluded from the growth which has recently taken place on the campus, including the installation of room telephones for resident students. Commuters should at least be entitled to the use of a telephone without charge, perhaps in the Commute Lounge. The opinions, hopes, and desires of the commuter population should no longer be overlooked as unimportant.

Second-rate building materials, along with the lack of a free telephone for commuters, are concerns which the college should carefully consider.

GRADS

Elaine Stewart, alias "Mother Manners," from the Marriott Dining Education Division. She stressed the necessity of good manners in all business situations and listed a few of her do's and don'ts.

When there is an RSVP, respond. Be on time... not early. And only eight minutes are allowed for socially accepted tardiness. Salt and pepper shakers are "married," so said Mother. Always pass them together. Never ask for seconds. Avoid taboo conversations topics such as sex, religion, politics, money, business, and children.

Her number one golden rule: "when in doubt - observe!"

Marti Little, assistant store manager for Proffitt's at Foothills, offered easy advice on interview attire. "Keep it clean, professional, and simple," she said. She also discouraged the seniors from spending a fortune on a business wardrobe immediately upon graduation. Instead she suggested stylish, classic pieces and colors that stay in fashion and can be diversified by accessories.

Cole Piper had a blunt but incredibly refreshing approach as he advised the soon-to-be new kids on the block.

Regarding resumés, he stressed the importance of accuracy. Regarding the actual face-to-face interview, "never, never ask about pay or vacation." Because, as he said, "if you are good, those things will work themselves out." His pearl of wisdom was a paradox coming from a 20th century businessman.

"Be honest."

His theory was based on the fact that nothing can hurt or help an individual like the truth. It always seems to surface.

Jean Jones, Career Planning and Placement Director and coordinator of the senior luncheon, welcomed the new seniors with a fine menu, compliments of Marriott, and a realistic look of what lies ahead in the coming months.

PHONE

One of its major advantages is the direct dialing feature. Also, the long distance rate is lower than the rate of phone charges off campus, mainly because the school purchased its own long distance service.

Brenda Binder, the big cheese of the entire operation, says, "the long distance is cheaper than using mom and dad's calling card." All local calls are absolutely free.

Students are pleased with the new system, although the bugs are still being worked out. Freshman Helen Costner said that it was "better now" and also that she "had not had a lot of problems with (it)." Junior Eileen Freund stated, "it's great we have phones [because] it's so much more convenient."

There have been some problems. Mrs. Binder blames most of these problems on students' inability to read their contracts and the information given about the system. Some rules and regulations to follow are:

1. Your PAC number is yours and yours only; if you loan it to anyone, you are responsible for the forthcoming phone bill.

2. Your PAC number can only be used from the phone in your room.

3. If you exceed your credit limit or forget to pay the phone bill, you will automatically be cut off from the system. There is also a $10 reconnection charge for those who don't pay their phone bill.

4. Don't have someone call you collect. If you do, the school will charge an extra $10 along with the cost of the call.

As long as each and every student is willing to abide by the rules and regulations indicated above, everything will be fine and dandy.

One footnote is that only touch tone phones can be used with the system. The regular rotary phones won't work. A common mistake is caused by some phones which are shaped in the classic business office style with buttons, but inside it has a rotary. If there are any problems, please contact Mrs. Binder. She will be in the phone office from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. during the week and from 4 p.m. to 8 p.m. on Tuesdays.

You will have 12 days to pay your phone bill after receiving it in the mail. A convenient directory is being completed and will be available to all MC people by the middle of October. The system is improving every day, so have patience.

MACCO Features Radnofsky

The Maryville-Alcoa College Community Orchestra (MACCO), with Paul Theissen conducting, will present its first concert of the 1989-90 season on Oct. 17 at 8:15 p.m. in Wilson Auditorium on the Maryville College campus. The concert, entitled "Pops and Sax," will feature ALCOA Foundation Affiliate Artist Kenneth Radnofsky.

Radnofsky, one of the country's very few concert saxophonists, will play a solo arrangement of George Gershwin's "Fascinatin'-Rhythm" and will also perform with the orchestra in Darius Milhaud's "Scarmouche" as well as in two pieces arranged by Theissen, "My Favorite Things" and "Tongue in Cheek." The orchestra will perform several pops selections, including Leroy Anderson's "Song of the Bells" and Clare Grundman's "Midnight Beguine." The concert will also feature "classical pops," such as "The Torch Dance" of Giacomo Meyerbeer and arrangements of Johannes Brahms' "Hungarian Dance," No. 1, and Franz Schubert's "Military Marches," Nos. 2 and 3.

Kenneth Radnofsky was the ALCOA Foundation Affiliate Artist for 1988-89. He made his Carnegie Hall debut in 1985 with the New York premiere of Gunther Schuller's "Saxophone Concerto" with the National Orchestra Association. The world premiere was also given by Radnofsky with the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra. In 1987 Radnofsky made his European debut as soloist with Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchestra. He has also been soloist with the Dresden Staatskapelle Orchestra, Boston Pops, Philadelphia Orchestra, the Oregon Symphony Orchestra, the Marlboro Festival, and the Portland String Quartet, to name a few.

Conductor Paul Theissen believes that Radnofsky will be an interesting addition to the concert. "The saxophone is an unusual instrument being presented in an orchestra concert," he said. "There are not that many pieces composed for saxophone and symphony orchestra. The variety of the pops program should be entertaining for the audience."

Wright's Watercolor in FAC Gallery

A mixed media exhibit with an emphasis on watercolor by the area artist Martha B. Wright will be on display from Oct. 4-31 at the Maryville College Fine Arts Center Gallery. Wright is well-known for her watercolors of carousels horses. She was the recipient of the People's Choice Award at the 1989 Blount County Dogwood Arts Festival. Her work was recently voted "Best of Show" at the Spring Jubilee in Pendleton, SC, in April and also at the Carousel Festival in Burlington, NC, in September. She has held several solo exhibits and has participated in workshops with Don Lake at Arrowmont in Gatlinburg, Frank Webb at Quinlan Art Center in Gainesville, GA, and Ron Ranson in Maryville. Wright is a resident of Alcoa, where she maintains a studio in her home. She received a bachelor's and a master's degree in art education from the University of Alabama. She also attended the Pratt Institute in New York City. The Fine Arts Gallery is open from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m., Monday through Friday.

"Dead Poet's" for Living

by Kristi Giles

"We don't read and write poetry because it's cute; we read and write poetry because we are human beings."

For anyone who has seen the film "Dead Poet's Society," the above quote by English teacher John Keating, played by Robin Williams, is a beautiful expression of his unique method of teaching. For those who have not yet seen this film, I strongly recommend that you do so.

"Dead Poet's Society" is an unusual film for actor Robin Williams involving a departure into a more serious and adult role. Though his portrayal of Keating is somewhat comic throughout the film, audiences can see a much more sensitive side to the actor in this role.

Keating is the new English teacher at a prestigious prep school for boys, Welton Academy. Because of his unusually non-traditional behavior in his first few days as a teacher at Welton, it takes some time for the students to adjust. But when the class discovers Keating, the students also discover that learning truly can be fun. Williams plays Keating with his usual wit, but emotions stir throughout the film with both laughter and tears.

"Dead Poet's Society" is much more than a film about education being fun; it is very symbolic. It is a film about growing up, about thinking for yourself, and about the inevitable pain of youth.

It deals with conformity, and how one teacher, completely against the will of the school administration, attempts to teach his students to discover themselves. Keating's objective is to teach things much deeper, more personal, than poetry alone. He wants his students to "find their own voice."

Though many would disagree with Keating's methods, I would agree with his goals. If students are to learn, they must be taught in a way that touches them, that attracts their attention. Keating accomplishes that goal in the film, much to the dismay of faculty, administration, and parents. But along the way, he gains the admiration and respect of his students. The students learn important lessons, not only about great poetry, but life.

This is a wonderful film, one that will leave its audience with important questions to consider about their own experiences. Few films can truly capture how it feels to be young, but "Dead Poet's Society" certainly does, and more. Do not miss this film.

Enrollment Increases for Second Year

press release

Maryville, TN--Maryville College enrollment is up for the second year in a row.

Total headcount for the 4-year liberal arts college is 856, an 8.7 percent increase over the 787 enrolled in the fall of 1988. The figure includes full-time students as well as continuing education students.

Since 1987, the College has seen a 45 percent increase in full-time enrollment and a 32 percent increase in total enrollment.

With full-time enrollment at 666, up from 586 in the fall of 1988, the school has also experienced a large increase in on-campus residents.

Maryville College has 443 students living in the dorms this year as compared to 388 last year and 323 the year before. The increase represents a 37 percent increase over the last two years.

According to Dr. Sue Wyatt, vice president for student development, "We are pleased with the increasing numbers of students choosing to live on campus and with the maturity level and leadership ability of the students attending Maryville."

Dr. Richard I. Ferrin, president of Maryville College, said, "I am pleased that we remain on track with our long range growth plan which was established for the College two years ago. We are once again delighted with the number of students who have enrolled this fall and with the strength of their academic backgrounds."

Families Inspire Loyalty to MC

by Christen Anderson

MC is a school characterized by history, including some of the college's students. Since the founding of the college in 1819, generations of families have attended MC, and this trend is still evident in today's enrollment. Numerous present MC students have parents, grandparents, or other relatives who have attended the college.

Kathy McArthur, a junior Writing/Communications major, is a fourth generation MC student. Her great-grandfather, Fred Lowry Proffitt, attended MC and served as Treasurer and Business Manager from 1913 to 1943. His wife, Estelle Proffitt, graduated from MC, and their daughter, Grace McArthur, met her husband David McArthur at the college. Kathy McArthur's mother, Elizabeth McArthur, attended MC, as did her aunt Alida McArthur Graves.

"MC has been a big influence on all of our lives," McArthur said. "Its positive qualities have been ingrained in my mind ever since I can remember."

McArthur, who transferred to MC because of her relatives' influence and the small size of the college, says the her relatives are pleased with the changes in the college.

"My grandparents are very pleased with the increased enrollment, new faculty members, and the changes in curriculum," she explained.

Carol Callaway, a sophomore Nursing major, has several relatives who have attended MC, including her father, Jim Callaway, her grandfather, Henry Callaway Sr., her uncles, Lee and Henry Callaway, her aunt Grace Callaway, and her sister, Margaret Ramsey.

Students aid Hugo victims

by Jeff Huffman

The trip to South Carolina was one that left deep impressions within all the volunteers who sacrificed the time to help the victims of this natural disaster.

On the television, coverage lasted about a week. Once the news stopped reporting on it, people forgot about it, thinking everything was peachy keen. Right now, the area that had been punched in the face by a howling Hugo is still trying to pick up whatever is left of it's former life.

The MC volunteers left, but because everything was fine. We all had work to catch up on. Many admitted they wanted to stay a little longer, but I don't know if I could have stayed, seeing the ceaseless refuge that Hugo swept up.

The people who are trying to get back on their feet have tremendous courage, because some have nothing but a huge box of clothes, which is overburdening the Red Cross. It will be a long time before these people will be able to live normal lives again.

My admiration goes out to the Red Cross. This outstanding organization was almost everywhere it was needed. Already, the Red Cross is experiencing a large deficit in it's budget due to its aid to the Hugo victims. Only a month later, the giant earthquake in California threw out even more responsibility to the Red Cross. The Red Cross may be a victim itself.

Such are the sacrifices of these organizations and groups which felt they had a responsibility as

Alcohol Policy: Is it working?

by Amirou Willingham

The alcohol policy for the 1989-90 school year has been effective but some feel that it is not fair to the students of drinking age. The policy does not permit the use or possession of alcoholic beverages on Maryville's campus, except in specific areas and at special occasions approved and supervised by the school if the students are the age of 21 or older.

Students are cooperating with the policy so far. Vice President for Student Life Sue Wyatt said "I really do appreciate that students are abiding by the alcohol policy." There have been a few incidents but students were cooperative and they were handled quickly she said.

The policy went into effect because there was a need to comply with state and federal laws because an atmosphere was being provided for those under the legal drinking age to consume alcohol.

"A lot had to do with liability. There was concern expressed from the President and Board of Directors about the direction of

Alums return as employees

by Kathleen McArthur

Every year as Homecoming approaches, the school begins preparation for the weekend that combines both the past and the future. New students and alumni join together for the biggest fall events on campus. It is a time for thinking back to the "good old days" and visiting with those graduates who have moved away.

In these busy times, however, many people forget about the alumni that never left, the faculty and staff members here at MC.

There are currently 38 graduates of the college employed on a full or part-time basis. Some that went on to other places have finally returned, and others never left.

Arthur Bushing, associate professor of English, graduated with the class of 1943. In his many years at MC, he has seen a great deal of progress. "Change at our school is constant, both academically and otherwise. We are always trying to revise the curriculum and courses. The college is constantly remodeling, remodeling, and reworking ... open for new ideas and willing to experiment," he said.

Debbie Nichols is the acquisitions assistant at the library. She graduated from MC in 1972. After living and working in Dayton, Ohio, she then returned to Maryville. As a student she worked part time in the library and currently finds membership in the staff equally enjoyable. Nichols states, "There are so many people who stay here at the college, you get a sense of continuity. The students change, and the faces are different, but the ## Student Senate completes elections

By Kathy McArthur

Positions for the 1989-90 student senate have been filled. The student body nominates representatives from each class. Dormitory senators are chosen by residents of each hall. The new senators are as follows: Freshman - Greg Basham and Doug Hof; Sophomores - Rees Cramer and Janet Gehlbach; Juniors - Brian Hemminger and Mike Moore; Seniors - Kevin Lynch and John Rhoades; Comitions of treasurer and budgetary muters - Shannon Lingenfelter and Mindy Bailey. Residence hall representatives are: Davis - Debbie Fayne; Gamble - John Knight; Lloyd - Robbie Binkerhoff; Copeland - Andrea Hollis; Pearsons - Peggy Lane.

This year's senate president is Jan Tomlin. John Rhoades is vice-president. Other positions appointed by the president are Parliamentarian Sundi Sims, and Secretary Kathy McArthur. Pos-officers will be decided at a later date.

The senate meets the second and fourth Thursday of each month in the C.C.M. at 12 p.m. President Tomlin stated, "The purpose of the senate is to serve as a body which deals with the interests and issues of the students. We are the major voice for students on campus."

Meetings are open to all students.

Buddy program touches Foster children

by Jeff Huffman

Most of us have a home, with a family that cares for us. What about those who have no real family, no parents, brothers, sisters to share their lives with? The family is a normal component of being raised, and is an important part of how an individual will mature and handle the world around them. Some children and teens don't have this necessary influence. Who's there for them?

There's where the Buddy Program comes in. The Buddy Program is a college based organization of various students from throughout the MC curriculum.

a child or teen in need of friendship because of the unavailability of family and friends. These young people come from foster homes and houses that take care of homeless children and teens. The Buddy Program, through the Department of Human Services, is provided with a number of kids in need of attention. Elizabeth McNeilly, a coordinator at the Department of Human Services, says that there are between 80 and 100 children and adolescents in need of a companion from the Buddy Program. Tim Bryant, a member of MC staff and an assistant coordinator of the Buddy Program, says "we have the capacity of dealing with kids from infancy to 18 years old."

McNeilly notes that "they (college students) have so much energy" and that "it (the program) is good for the kids and good for the students." She also noted that some students have the time in their schedules to assist in the care for the Buddy Program's occupants. There have been 25 students that have already shown an interest in the program. These participants do various activities, such as babysitting, tutoring, or even a clothes drive. Various MC clubs have shown interest in the Program. Staci Ames, the president of Circle K, says "We'd like to get some of our members involved in this on-campus program." The Program organized a Pizza Party on October 12. Bryant says "the pizza bash was very successful" and that "the kids had a great time."

The program was begun by an idea called "World Vision", in which kids all over the world were provided for through monetary donations. The Buddy Program is to be kept local, helping area youngsters. McNeilly notes "The program will need all the community involvement we can get." Anyone interested in helping out a child or teenager who is in need of a friend, contact Teresa Nchls at Box 2227.

Task Force sets sights

by Jessica Roitman

The Peace Education Task Force met Thursday, Oct. 5th at 1:00 p.m. in the commuter lounge of Fayerweather Hall. Projects for the upcoming year were discussed and a regular schedule for meetings was established.

Some projects considered for the next year include: recycling aluminum and glass, removing styrofoam cups and plates from the snack bar and cafeteria, collecting books and other school supplies for Nicaraguan schools, and a possible interim trip to Nicaragua.

Faculty advisor to the Peace Education Task Force, Dr. Percz Reilly said, "Projects undertaken are determined by what the students consider to be their priority in any given year." Both domestic and international issues relating to peace are investigated.

The Peace Education Task Force seeks to raise the level of awareness of people on campus and in the community on issues relating to peace. The organization accomplishes this task in a variety of ways.

Past projects have included speakers on issues such as Central America, a walk-a-thon to raise money for hospitals in Nicaragua, participation in last year's march for the homeless in Washington D.C., building a shanty town at Maryville College's campus, cooking for Dismas House, collecting items for Haven House (a shelter for victims of family violence) and forums dealing with racism and sexism on campus.

Anyone interested in the Peace Education Task Force should contact Dr. Percz Reilly for more information.

Impressions seeks creative talents

Jeff Huffman

Are you Impressionable? You have probably noticed this question posted somewhere on campus. This anonymous note from the editors of Impressions, the college literary magazine, is, as Noel Royer, editor-in-chief, puts it, a literary gallery in which to display the written and visual art of faculty and student.

Impressions has been published annually since 1975. Through each year, a collage of college students have put their time and talents into a magazine that gives with poetry, short stories, essays, photographs, and art. The purpose of the magazine is to encourage creative efforts in the campus community and to be an accurate reflection of the college community as a creative force," Royer said.

Impressions began as a supplement to the Highland Echo in 1974. Enough support was raised to have this conglomeration of art and writing established as a magazine independent of the paper. Two issues were published annually, one in the winter and one in the spring, until 1979. From then on, a whole year's material was combined into one larger issue. This helped the publication financially and also gave the organization more time to make a successful magazine. Through the years, there have been a handful of editors, managers, specialists, and advisors. This year editor-in-chief Noel Royer is being assisted by business manager Rae Ann Hickman, Lee Ann Bieber, Julie Mulaney, Sara Townsend, Pam Gunter, Mark Koerber, Missy Pankake, Jason Ezell, Jeff Huffman, Michelle Hall, and Stephanie Thrasher.

Business manager Rae Ann Hickman said, "we're looking for more campus support in the way of financial gifts so that the magazine will continue to grow. We need equipment so that this continued growth is possible."

This year, Impressions will have a contest for MC students. The top work done in the categories of poetry, essay, and short story will receive a $15 cash award. The winner will be decided by a selection committee of MC students and faculty.

Impressions is now taking entries in the categories mentioned above plus photography and art. If you have literary or artistic works to send in, please send typed work to box 2562 and notify Sara Townsend, box 2596, if you have artwork to send to Impressions.

For works of poetry, stories, and essays, send only copies of your work because entries cannot be returned. Be sure to indicate your name and box number on your entries. If anyone would like to send a tax deductible donation in support of Impressions, please send it to box 2592. Be Impressionable!

"Look, Mom! CD Rom."

by Travis Crabtree

Almost 400 academic periodicals are now accessible to M.C. students at Thaw Library thanks to the acquisition of Info-Trac II, a computerized periodical index system.

Info-Trac II, an updated and easy-to-use index, was decided upon because it gives access to more academically oriented journals which are important to college students. References to such leading titles as "The American Journal of Psychology" and "Modern Language Notes" are available through the terminal which is located in the corner of the reference section of the library.

Gygli breathes new life into MC theatre

by Kristi Giles

There are some new faces in the Theatre Department at MC this year. New on the faculty are Karen Gygli, instructor in the Theatre, and Alan Reihl, the new technical director.

"Basically," she said, "what we're looking for is to try to get more opportunities for students to direct their own stuff, more student-run things in the department, if we possibly can. That's sort of down the line of where we're thinking."

Gygli pointed out the strengths and the weaknesses of the Theatre Department at present. "Right now, it's a strength that [Maryville] has a good facility; it's a facility that hasn't been taken care of very closely, but that's changing now. A weakness is that there isn't a lot of exposure to plays beyond the classics."

Gygli felt more contemporary playreading is necessary to arouse interest and inform people of the new plays available. She welcomed anyone willing to spend time backstage as well as front-stage.

The system incorporates many technological advances that make its use simple and fast. The periodical index, a database of nearly 400 titles, is stored on CD-ROM (Read Only Memory) discs. These discs which look similar to the CD's of the music industry can store many times more information than regular diskettes. Students also have access to an air ink-jet printer which gives the printed reference with the press of a button. According to Joan Worley, Library Director, the system will appeal to students because it offers "one-stop" searching which virtually eliminates volume-by-volume searching and because the system is "tecky."

The system is also up-to-date. A new CD-ROM disc is received each month updating all periodicals as well as "The New York Times" index, which is usually four to six months behind.

The library carries about 60% of the periodicals on the index, Worley said. "But Info-Trac II is not a 'stand alone' referencing system," Worley added. It is not a substitute for further in-depth searches. "It is a broad-based general index suitable for quick searches," Worley said.

Several productions are being planned for the upcoming year, Gygli said. "Twelfth Night," which is the Interim production, a student-run production, will be performed at the beginning of February. In the spring they hope to do a musical.

The Theatre Department will present "Bus Stop" as the fall production. "It's a love story," Gygli explained. "It's about how people look for love, where they look for love, and the defenses they put up against love, even though they're looking for it." She said it is an interesting play, serious but still a comedy. "I think it says a lot for people today - it's sort of a self-absorbed age," she said.

The cast for "Bus Stop" includes Trish Lunsford, Andi Bristol, Charlotte Borderieux, John Worth, Rees Cramer, David Garzone, and Greg Basham, and Assistant Stage Director Rees Cramer.

"Bus Stop" opened Thursday, Oct. 26 and will run Fri. and Sat. at 8:15 p.m. and Sun. at 3:00 p.m. Admission is free to all MC students.

'Old' Faces Reveal New Talents

by Sarah Sawyer

Instruction is a talent that is distinct and separate from the art of performance, and all too often private lessons are limited to the performance of the student and the comments and instructions of the professor.

The Faculty Sampler Recital on October 6, 1989 in the Music Hall was a rare chance for students to see their instructors in the realm of performance.

The recital was a chance for the campus and the community to see what the faculty of the Music Department has to offer.

Robert Ergenbright, Vocal coach and Resident Bass-Baritone, accompanied by Dr. Robert Bonham, performed "Confutatis maledictis" (Requiem) and "Credo" (Otello) by Verdi and Mozart's "Non piu andrai" from Le Nozze di Figaro with captivating power and emotion.

John Fox, accompanied by Dr. Bonham, is Maryville's violin instructor this year. (He is substituting for Ms. Maryanne Fimmel who is the proud new mother of twins.) Mr. Fox plays with the Knoxville Symphony Orchestra, and usually instructs Maryville's Continuing Education Students. Mr. Fox performed Ravel's "tzigane" with vibrance and energy.

Victor and Sallie Schoen returned after a lapse in duet performance with "Six Waltzes, Op. 36" by Brahms. Their ability to complement each other makes any lapse in their performance as a duet a loss.

Dr. James Bloy performed a series of five sacred organ chorales by Bach. His style was classic and displayed obvious respect for the pieces, and honestly did Bach justice.

Dr. Robert Bonham, when not playing as an accompanist, performed Chopin's "Barcarolle Op. 60" with his usual style and grace.

Ms. Margret Mann, accompanied by her husband Paul Theissen, performed "deh tu bell anima" (I Capuletti ed i Montecchi) by Bellini and "Stride la vampa" (Il Trovatore) by Verdi with strength, incredible support, and yet, with grace.

Spectators were treated to an explosion of talent from the people that we see every day. Bravo! Bravo!

Morningside: more than a mouthful

by Kathleen McArthur

Imagine a Friday evening, soft candlelight, and beautiful music rising from the keys of the piano. Conversation is shared between friends over a dinner of Pork Dijonnaise, stir-fried vegetables, and stuffed potatoes, complete with salad and fresh bread. The service is excellent and the atmosphere is soothing.

Most people would think a thirty minute drive to Knoxville preceded this scene. But, experiencing this evening is within walking distance from any dorm on campus. People from all surrounding cities come to enjoy "Morningside Inn" set right in the middle of our college woods.

The restaurant was opened in September 1985 and is run by Tom and Nan Taylor, both Maryville College alumni. Since then, it has become known as one of the most elegant places for lunch, dinner, wedding receptions, or private parties in the entire area.

Taylor feels the main

The building itself holds a great deal of MC history. In 1932, the wife of John Walker came from Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania and built "Morningside" to be near his sister's home, which MC calls "The House in the Woods."

His sister died in 1950 at age 98 and left the home to the college in her will. One year later, President Ralph Waldo Lloyd made it his residence. President Joseph J. Copeland then took over in 1961 and resided there during his term.

Taylor said, "I think Mrs. Walker built the home in the spirit of entertaining. She meant it to be used in a happy way, inviting Girl Scout troupes and Sunday school classes over for parties. That social history was then handed down for others to entertain."

In addition to the atmosphere of the house, the menu contains classic favorites. Taylor's own sweet breads are complimentary with lunch selections, which include their popular chicken salad with almond. For dinner, worked in this area for 30 years, and his entrees bring wide recognition to the inn. "I have been in this county all my life and worked at Blackberry Farm and Green Meadow Country Club. A lot of people know me and my cooking."

The prices are what is to be expected from fine dining, and though it may seem steep to a student's budget, the extra expense is worth it for special occasions or for entertaining parents and students visiting the campus. Also, those looking to spend less, Sunday brunch and the lunch menus are reasonable. Of course, there is always room for those who just want to take an evening break accented with a wide range of homemade desserts and coffee.

The inn is a great place for students and faculty to experience some history of MC and enjoy a nice evening with close friends. The restaurant offers what Taylor calls, "a fine dining experience."

"Morningside" is open Sunday through Friday, 11 a.m. to 2

Hints for Homesick Blues

by Kristi Giles

Eventually it hits. The "Homesick Blues," or the HB's, usually hit sometime around October, right after the initial oh-boy-I'm-finally-on-my-own syndrome begins to wear off. Students who were feeling on top of the world because of their newly-discovered independence suddenly feel like outcasts, like loners in an unknown land. Those with a case of the HB's can be easily spotted by several obvious symptoms: long, drawn-out facial expression, lack of ability to concentrate, and the desire to be "left alone."

But what can be done to combat the HB's? Sure, togetherness helps. Finding other victims of the adjustments to the emotional security decor of your room, which means putting things in your room which remind you of when you were a child.

Since youth is a time when most of us have our greatest fill of the concept of emotional security, it is very important, even as young adults, to hang onto a few of those treasures which we cherish most. It could be a worn-out stuffed animal, a deflated old football, or a trophy won in Little League; the point is, remember those times.

I am not recommending that the victims who experience the HB's this fall live in the past, but merely visualize what it meant to what then?

The best solution can be found within the walls of your own dorm room. Look around; how many things have you brought from home to comfort yourself? For instance, how many reminders are there in your present living arrangement which put you in touch with your former environment? If there are few, then perhaps you need to make some maybe it is time to write mom and dad a letter so that good old "Teddy" or that "Best Pitcher" trophy can be on its way soon.

After all, even though you are becoming an adult now, there is still a part of us which will always remain a child. So don't feel silly when your friends see those things in your room. If it cures the Homesick Blues, "Teddy" may be the best pal you'll ever have.

Mountain challenge soars

by Jeff Huffman

So just what is Mountain Challenge? It's an organization that is responsible for the many wilderness trips which various students on campus have taken. The program offers a wide variety of opportunities for the adventurous and/or the curious.

The Mountain Challenge idea began around five years ago as an experiment for one inquiry group. Since then, it has expanded to cover not only eight inquiry classes, but other independent trips and expeditions as well.

The agenda of activities includes: the famous "ropes" courses, including rope I, II, and III; rock climbing and rappelling; bicycling; mountain trips, which include day hikes and backpacking; and water trips, in which you can experience flat-water canoeing and whitewater kayaking.

A participant may be canoeing through Chilhowee lake, hiking through the Smokies, hang off a 50 foot cliff with only two ropes holding them between life and death, or creatively moving through a giant obstacle course.

You do not have to have any skill or experience in most of these activities. These programs are provided for those who are willing to learn something new.

Along with the Mountain Challenge activities, there is a certain underlying philosophy which directs the activities that are taken. The experiences gained are to help people have more leadership, more responsibility, and more understanding of the world around them.

The program is also meant for fun. Anyone who goes on one of the trips will gain a new perspective on their lives. Bruce Guillaume, director of Mountain Challenge activities, says "I think that Mountain Challenge is a powerful addition to the curriculum."

Frigid to Fire, With a Video Twist

by Dan Reynolds

Sex, Lies, and Videotape is an attractive, witty psychodrama in which director Steven Soderbergh succeeds admirably in creating psychological tension and in generating some laughs before the film deteriorates into an encounter session.

The plot is a love triangle with a twist. The triangle consists of Ann (Andie MacDowell), a beautiful southern woman who, as she informs her therapist, has "never been that much into sex"; her husband, John (Peter Gallagher), a sleazy successful lawyer who is into sex; and her sister Cynthia (Laura San Giacomo), who compensates for Ann's lack of interest by sleeping with John and getting quite a perverse thrill out of it. Its a static situation that has been going on for some time.

The twist involves an old college friend of John's, Graham (James Spader). Graham is a soft-spoken, introspective wanderer whose purpose in the movie is to change everybody's lives.

Clouded in mystery, both Ann and Cynthia are attracted to Graham. After revealing to Ann that he is impotent except when he is alone, Graham spends a lot of his time sitting quietly at home watching videotape interviews that he has conducted of women talking about sex. He later attributes his impotency with women as a result of his hatred of lies, explaining to Ann that in sexual relations with women, he becomes a pathological liar. Comparing himself to a recovering alcoholic he is resolved to never lie again, thus to never love again. However, Ann, who credits Graham with helping her face the lies about her marriage and her life, is determined to resolve her frigidity and Graham's impotency. Like everyone else in the film, Graham is unable to lie to himself in front of the video camera. And like the reluctant gunfighter of old westerns, Graham faces up to who he is and does what a man has to do.

The ending is the weakest part of the film. After establishing a good deal of psychological tension, it leaves one with the feeling of the old adages "honesty is the best policy" or "to thine own self be true." For all of Soderbergh's surface sophistication, its ending is simple and naive. Honest prevails, liars are punished, and people find out who they are. Despite its weak ending, the movie is still a good one to see because of its witty dialogue, standout performances, and overall oddball seductiveness.

... from mouth of babes, Willis seeks dad

by Melissa Martinez

A marathon of sperm racing through the human body to the tune of "I Get Around" in order to attack a large jelly doughnut, otherwise known as The Egg, is merely the beginning of two hours of zaniness in Look Who's Talking.

Besides being silly, entertaining, and full of laughs, Look Who's Talking pokes fun at the adult rituals of dating and relationships.

The movie begins with the conception of Mikey, the baby and narrator of the movie. Bruce Willis is the wise-cracking voice that accompanies four different child actors as well as a clay-animated fetus throughout the movie.

In an angry tirade directed at Mikey's father who has just dumped her, Kirstie Alley identifies her character Molly as sensible, practical, down-to-earth, and even a little boring. She is, after all, merely an accountant. However, her actions throughout the movie prove she is anything but boring.

A woman who wears a black and lavender bra under her dowdy work clothes, makes love on a stone desktop, punches out her cab driver while in labor, and smashes a statue with a fold-up baby stroller is definitely not boring. Alley's portrayal of Molly is great because the audience is kept on the edge of their seats waiting to see what she'll do next.

John Travolta is cast as James, the unfortunate cab driver that meets Molly while she's in labor and hangs around afterwards.

James is just too one-sided, and he weakens the plot because he is simply Mr. Perfect. Molly's total reluctance to get involved with James is hard to understand. A few faults here and there would have made the plot more believable.

After giving birth to Mikey and meeting James, Molly decides to find Mikey the best possible daddy and goes on a dating spree to start the selection process. James, who would love to be the daddy, is put on the backburner as the babysitter. Mikey is the commentator on all the hilarious scenes that follow.

Although the end of the movie is predictable from the first ten minutes on, the way by which Molly, James, and Mikey arrive is anything but predictable.

At the conclusion, Mikey steals the show with the combination of innocent baby faces backed by Willis' one-liners. He gives new meaning to the saying "Out of the mouth of babes..."

Belushi buried but not dead yet

by Travis Crabtree

How many times does a man have to die to gain peace and forgiveness? Most would like to believe (and the answer should be) only once. But for John Belushi, it seems that four deaths are not sufficient to erase the media stains which taint his tombstone in Martha's Vineyard.

Once the funniest man in Hollywood, his legacy is not the laughter which he gave so many but the example that he has become for the sensationally bent journalists who circle the Hollywood Hills looking for prey who cannot fight back. And with each passing death, the memory of John grows weaker in each of his fans.

John's first death, his physical one, spurred a chain reaction that is still erupting today in Hollywood. John died of some sort of drug overdose, but the question soon arose about who actually inserted the needle into John. The press soon had this "hot" story on the screens of every TV in the land, and somewhere in Washington D.C., a journalist by the name of Bob Woodward smelled a story. Woodward then set about to cause John's third death and published "Wired," an expose about Belushi's short life. A few in Hollywood would not sit idly by and watch their beloved friend continually be stabbed by those out for a fast buck. They rallied together and tried to prevent what would become John's fourth, and most painful death. Dan Ackroyd, Carrie Fisher, Elliott Gould, Buck Henry, and a host of other close Belushi friend instigated law suits, studio boycotts, and harsh criticism on "Wired-The Movie." The sweet smell of cash, however, made the greedy nostrils of producers flare, and now one can pay $5.00 to watch an era's greatest comedian die yet again.

But what is the truth about John Belushi? He was a man who used drugs. No one argues that; however, what is arguable is the way that the public is being forced to remember him by the L.A. vulture culture. Everyone has periods of instability and insecurity in his life, and it seems John is now viewed as an insecure, paranoid drug addict. No one cares to remember all the great things about John; his Joe Cocker imitations, his famous arched eyebrow, his great timing, and the many laughs that he gave his fans. The memory which most people have of John Belushi is an indicator of the media control over the public. Will John be remembered for his great merits or his misdeeds- it is for you to decide.

Dear Friends,

I would like to personally thank you for all the calls, cards, and prayers that were extended toward my family and me during our recent time of need. From President Ferrin to the MC Concert Choir to numerous colleagues, your support was outstanding and greatly appreciated. I must also express my gratitude to Dr. Kim and my fellow MC students who were a bountiful source of support when the news of my father's death reached Seoul.

When one leaves MC for an extended period of time, it is easy for him to take for granted the family support that MC offers. I will never forget and always have a deep respect for the outpouring of sympathy and love that MC provided me.

I look forward to seeing you all in the near future. Best wishes.

Very truly yours,

My first thoughts after hearing news reports of flag-burning were less than nice. My stomach knotted up and I wanted to scream "throw the communist pigs out!" My next thoughts were less reactive and more reflective. Why had I responded in such a defiant, near violent way?

I remembered standing in a movie theatre on a military base overseas. The entire audience was at attention as the national anthem was played and scenes of America flashed on the screen; it ended with the flag waving and whipping in an unfelt breeze. And I remembered a very homesick, very bewildered country girl on foreign soil, crying the first time she saw the flag from this perspective.

A matter of respect Debate continues

I remembered being other places overseas and people telling me how lucky I was to be an American. The "land of choice," they said, while their governments determined dress, curfews, bread and water supplies and drinking privileges.

And somewhere in dark corners I remembered, as a little girl, decorating graves of deceased family members with small flags. "Just don't forget," granny always said.

It's a question of freedom. The one binding force of this country, our choice to convey, display, shout, or pray our opinions and beliefs, is sometimes our dividing line. But this freedom came at a price. This price was paid by both liberals and conservatives.

And although I could not endorse any governmental policies which censor or tailor our voices, I still cringe at the thought of such hideous behavior. I want to send these flag-burners to a place like China where such an 'American' freedom has severe consequences.

It's a question of respect.

'Artsy-fartsy' types Smoke Helms

by Steve Ledman

The front-men for the Bush administration's law and order agenda are at it again. This time, Sen. Jesse Helms carries the torch of offended sensibilities in the quest to bring moral approbation back into the American culture.

Of course crusades to protect the innocence of the American polity are nothing new for this virulent spokesman of the republican right. Now however it seems that avant-garde art has inflamed this tireless protector of American moral values. So, with Pres. Bush at the tiller, this patrician of high culture has thrown down the gauntlet over the government's funding of the National Endowment for the Arts (NEA).

Normally, Sen. Helms finds that any art more expressive than Norman Rockwell's offensive. Unfortunately for him, the established art community rarely, if ever, exhibits (much less funds) work which doesn't appeal to the over-worked status quo.

This sad fact leaves Sen. Helms little room to make political fodder out of art which he feels is leading to the moral decline of the American empire--a decline he likens to the mythical moral decline of the Roman empire.

But Sen. Helms' luck changed recently when the art community's sad conspiracy to slowly erode the morals of the American public was exposed in Washington D.C. There, the Corcoran Gallery, a recipient of NEA funding, refused to exhibit a survey of Robert Mapplethorpe's work because some of it was sexually explicit, or, more particularly, homosexually explicit.

The Corcoran's refusal predictably enraged Washington's liberal art community, not only because Mapplethorpe's work had been widely acclaimed in other galleries, but also because the Corcoran in its defense never denied the artistic value of the work but maintained that right-wing threats to restrict future NEA funding had influenced its decision not to show Mapplethorpe's work.

Finally Sen. Helms had a foe worthy of his charge. And there is no better foe indeed for Helms' onslaught in defense of America's morals than these high-brow, effeminate, artsy-fartsy types. No self-respecting good-ole-boy trusts these sissy artists anyway, right?

What a grand issue to rally the home folks to. Real juicy stuff this moral decline; it makes for the perfect 30-second campaign appeal: Mom, Pop, apple pie all threatened by those dastardly effeminate artists.

All this demagoguery scares the fire out of the democrats; no one wants to go home and explain how they funded the far-out expressions of avant-garde art when the local symphony couldn't build a new hall for lack of federal funds.

And so debates over the nature of art are lost in the rush to appease Helms' rhetoric: Will we only support the status quo--more Norman Rockwell and other American kitch--or will we use government funds to support daring experimentalization? Should the Government fund the arts at all or should we let corporate America continue to be the main funder of the arts?

None of these questions are asked in the current political atmosphere. Now the rage of the media is to focus on the foibles of congress.

Sen. Helms' gallant attempt to carry the torch of Bush's big business agenda failed utterly when congress just rolled over and passed a watered down version of Helms' proposal to censor the arts. This time Helms failed to sufficiently tie congress' hands; regrettably for him they insist on trying to affect the social fabric of America.

hances the college's long line of traditional values.

"I was practically raised on campus," she said. "By going to MC I can be close to home but still as far away as I want to be."

Callaway said that making a name for herself has been one of the major challenges of her college career.

"Everyone knew my name, but I had to prove that I'm not my sister; I'm an individual."

Growing up hearing stories about MC made Callaway more familiar with the college, although she is glad the rules today are more lenient than during her father's college years.

"They had ridiculous visitation hours, and a guy couldn't even hold a girl's hand in public," she explained.

Callaway's relatives are happy to see MC's growing enrollment.

"My dad thinks that the increased size will give us more national attention that will improve the overall education, and the various sports programs."

Sophomore Amie Davis' mother, father, grandfather, and aunt attended MC, and her mother, Donna, is the college's Business human beings to help out their fellow man in need. When I saw these people, some from as far away as Michigan, come out in a totally disparate land and help someone they had never met, I was amazed. When I joined in the effort, I was amazed that I was doing the very same thing.

The only negative side effect with aiding the area was that when I left, I felt I had not totally fulfilled my responsibility to these people. I, with everyone else, wanted to stay and clean up the place until it was completely normal again. It's going to take years to do such a thing, but most still feel they are supposed to be there.

It was amazing how many people I got to know in the area of devastation. At any other time, we could have been average Joes just walking by each other on the sidewalk. Now we were helping each other out, restoring my faith in the possibility that human beings can act human. Everyone learned lessons, good and bad.

Right now, my heart goes out to those in San Francisco, San Jose, Oakland, and my admiration goes out to those who volunteer to help.

Davis also cited her aunt, Stacy Davis-Nordquist, as an influence in her choice of colleges.

"Seeing Stacy with MC friends that she still keeps in touch with made me realize how important a small, caring community like MC could be."

ALCOHOL

Maryville College on this issue" said Director of Campus Life Leslie Nier.

The policy like many others has its downfalls. The lack of fairness to those of drinking age happens to be one of them.

"If a person is of legal drinking age they should be able to consume alcohol on this campus," said Freshman Sundiata Simms.

"It limits personal freedom," said Sophomore Tom Touzeau. All students who are 21 or older can not get into Pearson's, the dormitory in which drinking is permitted, and M.C. only allows those who are at least 23 to move off campus.

Some are displeased about the policy but students have had input into the implementation of the administration option. It serves as a session that the offender has with the Director of Student Life Leslie Nier, in which a minor sanction is given and counseling. If they choose to violate it then the next step is more severe.

The students gave input during 35 to 40 listening sessions last year.

"We are dealing with you as human beings with the dignity and respect that you deserve and we expect the same," Leslie Nier said.

Student Development has a developmental philosophy from the standpoint of teaching responsibility to the students she said.

Copeland's Residence Dorm Director Perry North said that the new policy "takes a lot of the burden off of staff. It is cut and dry, with no confusion."

There were cases in the past in which students of drinking age were caught with younger students with alcohol and they couldn't evaluate if the younger ones were drinking he said.

Other students have had comments about the alcohol policy. "If students are drinking they are doing a good job of hiding it" said Senior Dean Walsh.

"The only thing that I have learned about abusing alcohol is that it only gets you into trouble" said Junior B.B. Hudspeth. "About the policy, it really doesn't affect me. This college is very lenient compared to other Christian affiliated schools."

Believe it or not

by Skip Heverly

His soft step alternates with the sharp "thud" of a wooden post as he descends down the stairs. His movements awaken and send affright the bats that have been his houseguests for over a hundred years.

It is Saturday night, and the dim glow of the setting sun fades, leaving the campus in a mysterious and eerie darkness.

The hazy apparition continues his descent to the bottom of the stairs and pauses to look through his cloudy, ancient eyes. He can see the bats darting acrobatically outside the round cross-shaped window. He groans lowly; the pain where his left leg used to be is sharp.

The medals clank together on his old, bloodied grey uniform. The medals from a vicious, costly war fought many years ago. The medals from a war that cost our country 600,000 lives, and cost the apparition his life, too.

At the Battle of Antietam, his leg was blown off by an exploding cannon shell. With Confederate forces being routed, he was unable to receive medical attention and bled to an agonizing death.

He was Lieutenant George Milford Pearson, 23rd Infantry Division. Before the war he was an apprentice bricklayer, working on the buildings of our already prestigious college.

When the Civil War broke out he was drafted, and of course had to leave Maryville College. However, he never forgot his "home" in MC, and, to this day, continues to reside in the belltower of Anderson Hall, keeping watch over our campus, and occasionally appearing to faculty members or students, asking for his missing leg.

Entrepreneurship lends much to education

by Scott Brunger

The term "social entrepreneurship" refers to the capacity to conceive, plan, and manage nonprofit or government organizations. In a society as dynamic as the United States, social entrepreneurship is as important as business entrepreneurship. Oftentimes the changes in the economy create new social needs that must be fulfilled by non-business organizations.

Isaac Anderson, the founder of Maryville College, was a social entrepreneur. In the early 1800's the opening of the American frontier to tap its vast economic resources in land and raw materials created needs for more educated people in the West. Anderson appealed to Princeton University graduates to come west to lead churches and teach school, but found that they preferred the comfortable and predictable life on the east coast to the rigors and dangers of the frontier. Presbyterians provided financing, though, for starting a new college in Tennessee, so Anderson began to assemble students and a faculty which were the precursor of Maryville College. Without his vision and commitment, the college would not have existed.

Kin Tekahashi, a Japanese student at Maryville College, was the social entrepreneur who organized the first football team in 1889 and the construction in the 1890's of Bartlett Hall as a recreation facility. He raised money by selling coupons each representing one brick for the building and then mobilized students to make the bricks. Bartlett Hall was the first student Y.M.C.A. built in the South.

Eliot Wigginton recently received an honorary degree from MC. He became a social entrepreneur by founding Foxfire Magazine. As a school teacher, he found that Appalachian

Judge Young explains case

by Jessica Roitman

Blount County Judge Dale Young came to Maryville College on Wednesday Nov. 1st to discuss his controversial decision regarding the fate of seven frozen embryos stored at Knoxville's Fort Sanders Regional Medical Center.

Students and faculty sat on the floor or sprawled on couches in the lobby of Lloyd Hall, as they listened to Young give an informal presentation about his life and his ruling in the embryo case.

The 51 year old judge called himself "average people." He wove the theme of "choices" throughout his talk. He spoke of the choices that made him a judge and the various choices that led him to his historic decision in the courtroom. He also told the group about his educational background (he is a graduate of Maryville College) and his political and judicial career.

Young went on to explain how he reached his verdict. "I was faced with only two options; calling them (the embryos) property or persons," he said. He added that he could only rule on the evidence supplied during the course of the trial. When asked by student David Perez if the outcome of the case was affected by the witnesses, Young replied, "...with different witnesses the case would have been totally different."

During the question and answer period, students and faculty asked the judge such questions as: "Did you try to get the couple back together?", "When do you think life begins?", and "How do you reconcile your decision with your obligation as a judge to avoid dictating public policy?"

The judge was not able to answer a great many of the questions because of the possibility that the case might come back to his court in the form of a child support battle if his decision is upheld in a federal appeals court and if Mrs. Davis carries one of the embryos to term. Young was also unwilling to answer questions dealing with the implications of his ruling such as a question asked by one student, "Is the woman obligated to try to have all seven embryos?" He also refused to answer questions regarding his personal opinions about in vitro fertilization and when life begins. He said, "My opinion on these issues is a moot point."

Freshman Sarah Sawyer seemed to echo the sentiments of the majority of those attending the presentation when she said, "I felt the program was informative. It really opened my eyes to what the judicial process is all about."

Recycling active at MC

by Jeff Huffman

The Environmental Task Force, an organization working for the betterment of the environment, has started a campaign to recycle cans all over the MC campus. There will be tall white boxes designated with "can recycle" on the side, and three round holes on top. These boxes are located in Isaac's, Commuter Lounge, FAC, Sutton Science Center, Crawford House, Anderson, and in each dorm.

Each and every can collected will be recycled, with the money going to Earth Day 1990, an environmental project of Crawford House.

The project was begun after a forum on the environment had been presented at MC, featuring members of the industrial complex and members of the MC staff which spoke to MC students about the problems that must be dealt with in today's environment.

Traditions live

by Christen Anderson

Thanksgiving. The holiday evokes images of delicious smelling, tender turkey, juicy cranberry sauce, steaming hot stuffing, pumpkin pie and relatives everywhere, smiling and laughing.

While college students are probably more pleased with the prospect of a break from classes, Thanksgiving does give students the opportunity to spend special time with their families. Students around the campus described their family's various traditions.

"My family's Thanksgiving traditions include eating dinner with all of my relatives and watching the Macy's Thanksgiving Day Parade," said sophomore Kristin Metcalf.

"Everyone is in a better mood around Thanksgiving, and I get to eat and watch football," offered Wendy Kallstrom.

Amie Davis describes her most memorable Thanksgiving as the holiday with her Japanese exchange student. "It was interesting to see someone who wasn't familiar with Thanksgiving, and try to describe our customs to her. We all go to my grandmother's house, and everyone goes around the table and states something that they're thankful for, then we eat and watch ball games."

Junior Michelle Rudisill cites family togetherness as her favorite part of the holiday. "About 50 to 75 of our relatives go up to our cabin in the mountains -- it's fun having all of my relatives together at once."

Rees Cramer, who is spending this year's holiday in Florida, said, "My favorite part of Thanksgiving is being a pig and watching the Macy's Thanksgiving Day Parade."

Junior Susie Hoffman explained, "Since my family is German, we add dumplings and red cabbage to the traditional meal. It's great to spend time with my family and help cook!"

Sophomore Julie Miller stated that her favorite aspect of the holiday is eating turkey sandwiches for two weeks. "My most memorable Thanksgiving was the year when my entire family went to the beach for a turkey picnic," she added.

"Last year we had four generations at our table," explained Lori Chambers. "It's great to get a chance to go home, be with my family and eat lots of fancy food."

Scott Steele's favorite part of Thanksgiving epitomizes a college student's attitude. "I love the naps after dinner!" he said.

While the Thanksgiving break will soon fly by, everyone will be

T.C. Talks Philosophy is a terrible thing to waste

by Travis Crabtree

The absence of a philosophy major at Maryville College severely distorts its portrayal as a true liberal arts college, for the notion is widely held that philosophy is the hinge upon which the college education swings.

According to David Cartledge, Professor of Philosophy and Religion, the philosophy major was slowly extinguished in the early sixties when he first came to the college. The head of the philosophy department was also the advisor to all those interested in philosophy, Cartledge said.

Following a trend in those days to study the philosophy of something (for example, the philosophy of science), she required that her students major in a corollary field of interest and minor in philosophy. This program was well-suited for many students; however, it severely cut back the philosophy department as most of their students were now majoring in a different field; subsequently, the administration cut back on courses and instructors in the department. The major was no more.

Yet, the philosophy major does not seem to be missed. Business and economics are now the standard majors for most college students, and colleges across the nation have met the demand by expanding the personnel and budgets of those departments while not paying heed to the deficient education that students are gaining in other areas.

Those with no philosophical training are also those with no formal instruction in logic, in analytical skills, and in critical thinking; conversely, those with philosophical backgrounds are those whose decisions follow certain ordered procedures and patterns.

Philosophy entices the student with ideas of the origin, meaning, and purpose of life; and offers puzzling and fascinating doctrines on the the existence or non-existence of a higher being. In short, the field of philosophy offers to the inquiring student the possibility of answers to many questions and dilemmas.

If the mind is not exposed to philosophy, however, it cannot be enriched. The advantage in contemporary society seems to lie with those who are objective and discerning, and it has always been the thought that a college should give its students that advantage and not just a piece of paper.

In order for the students at MC to intellectually grow and for the college to establish itself as a true liberal arts school, a philosophy major with adequate faculty and funding must be reinstated. MC students are paying for and deserve more than a piece of paper.

The Maryville College experience should prepare, not deter or hamper, students from pursuing advanced studies in the fields of their choice.

The administration claims that MC is a liberal arts college and attracts many students with this claim. It's time to call their bluff and to have them stand by their claim. Bring back a Philosophy major.

Student publications suffer from lack of support

by Jana Dalton

For years the interest in and the financing of the various student publications of Maryville College has diminished or, at best, stagnated. Support had dwindled to the point that although a college publications committee exists, it has failed to meet in the last year and a half, possibly longer. Therefore the apathy lies not just with the student body.

So the question arises of the need for student publications? Is it necessary to have creative outlets, artistic forms generated by the talents, and yes, sweat of the students? No one would that is nice to have a recording of this grand old time known as college life. This question is as ludicrous as 'is it necessary to have sports?' The arts are an integral part of our nature.

Yet, year after year, staffs gather for all three campus publications with great robust energies to confront the huge obstacles: lack of support, lack of equipment, and more importantly lack of funds to produce items that will entice and intrigue today's visually oriented student body. Year after year small plans of loyalists, dedicated to the written word, weep and wail and wry over committed hands to produce something of value.

Admittedly, many have failed in their attempts.

Perhaps the cycle began with the unsatisfactory end-product, ergo no interest, ergo no money. Yet there have been a shining few who have succeeded at least to the extent of their means.

Does campus satisfaction mean a bonus or an increased budget or even a fatherly pat on the back? What exactly is the redeeming factor required?

It is apparent that is a live or die situation. The publications should be better, if not, then not at all.

This presents a grand solution, especially with this year's writing major expanded in number of students, as well as, in course-work. The need for hands-on writing outlets is greater than ever.

But what of practical assistance? Journalism is still taught in one semester. A class that should be covered in two at the very least.

Until this school year, little or no instruction has ever been provided for the yearbook staff. The Impressions staff has been surviving by their gut for several years now.

Since the job appears too difficult to do and do well, forget it. That is a contradiction that creative writing interest in growing on campus.

There simply is not the training necessary for jobs of this magnitude. One eternal problem is the absence of carry over editors year to year.

Every fall the staffs begin fresh, green and ignorant to the expectations. And the reason retention is so poor is generally because school work suffers so greatly from the stress of the 'extra-curricular' activity that the GPA can only withstand one year of editorship. They are simply pooped.

It is a paradox that a college as academically proud as Maryville is, has so few role models to represent them.

Helms viewed as public defender, not censor

by Brian Austin

I asked my friend, an art major at Tufts University, just what she thought art was and what might be some of its impacts on society. Her response to the question, basically, was that art is something created by the human imagination and characterized by aesthetic qualities. Aesthetic, for most people, being defined as a thing of beauty.

And so when I read a recent article, written by Steve Ledman, concerning his opinion on a political debate over whether U.S. taxpayer's money should be used toward the funding of certain "questionable" art work, I felt compelled to write a response. To be perfectly frank, I was rather surprised at Ledman's blatant inability to present both sides of the issue in a candid and accurate manner, specifically his character assassination of Senator Jesse Helms. I'm sure Ledman must be aware of the fact that name-calling for the purposes of strengthening one's argument is not a very valid method of reasoning.

Moreover, while making his position quite clear, Ledman failed to mention many of the facts relating to Senator Helms and the specific case brought up in the article. His column attempts to have us believe that Senator Helms' sole purpose is to limit the people's freedom of expression through the censorship of what might be deemed "lewd" material; while portraying Helms, the Corcoran Gallery, and anyone who believes government money could be spent elsewhere, as narrow-minded simpletons too conservative to view art as anything more than a painting of colorful flowers.

What Ledman doesn't tell you, in this article pervaded with dogmatic jargon, is that the so-called "avant-garde" art of Robert Mapplethorpe (whose name is now threaded into the tapestries of the AIDS quilt) consists of various photography picturing male homosexuals performing sadomasochistic functions on each other. Indeed, some of us do seem to draw a very thin line between what might be considered homosexual pornography and art.

Now that the facts have been uncovered, the situation calls for a more prudent reexamination under a new light. The real issue isn't a question of morals, but of a pragmatic nature. Senator Helms concedes that such artists have every right to engage in such activities and call it art, but should the taxpayers be paying for this when more necessary problems, such as poverty, environmental needs, the budget deficit, and adequate health care for our senior citizens, must be addressed? His desire to withhold funds is not an act of censorship, but a reaffirmation of common sense. Senator Helms is quoted as saying "If someone wants to write ugly nasty things on the men's room wall, the taxpayers do not provide the crayons." Once again, Ledman failed in his attempt to alienate Senator Helms with the statement "Sen. Helms gallant attempt ... failed utterly ..." since Ledman was obviously unaware that the move by Sen. Helms upholds an earlier decision by the House of Representatives to limit such funding to the NEA by $54,000, the exact amount it cost to exhibit the works of Serrano and Mapplethorpe. Which leaves me wondering just whose opinion is more encompassing of American public opinion, Senator Helms' or Steve Ledman's?

Q: What did you think of the dance being in a barn?

A: It was definitely different.

Q: Do you think the absence of alcohol hampered the dance?

A: No. I don't drink.

Q: What class seemed to be the predominant one?

A: I don't think that there was one. It seemed pretty mixed to me.

Q: What did you think about the location of the dance?

A: I think I liked it better because it was off-campus.

Q: What did you think of the choice of a barn as the site?

A: Well, I was on the decorations committee, and we spent a lot of time on the barn. I don't think that it really looked like a barn when we were through.

Q: What did you think about the dance being in Townsend and in a barn?

A: At first I thought it sucked, but once I got there it was O.K. I thought the barn idea was terrible too, but it was a pretty good barn as barns go. I thought that it was taking a big chance though to have it that far off campus with all the drinking that took place.

Q: What did you think about the location being in a barn?

A: I liked it. The decorations were good with the incense and candles, but it was a little cold.

Q: Did you feel like the student body became separated because of the location?

A: No. There were a lot of people there, and a shuttle bus was available too.

Q: Did the absence of alcohol bother you?

A: No. I didn't care. It didn't bother me.

Q: Did one class seem to be more heavily represented than the others?

A: No, it seemed to me that it was pretty evenly mixed.

Q: Do you know anyone who was pulled over coming back to campus?

A: Yes, I know of quite a few people.

Q: What did you think about the dance being in Townsend?

A: I thought that it was different, but it was also fun. The location didn't seem to play a part in the splintering of the student body. If someone wanted to go to see R.E.M., they would have gone anyway.

Q: Should alcohol have been allowed for those over 21 since it was off-campus?

A: I think they should have allowed those over 21 to drink since it was off-campus.

Q: Which class seemed to be best represented there?

A: Of the people that I know who were there, most were sophomores.

Q: What did you think about the music?

A: It did not suit my personal taste. It seemed to me to be about half pop and half metal.

Barn dance differs from past

by Staci Ames

Maryville College had its 1989 Homecoming Dance on November fourth. The Saturday night dance was held in a barn of all places, due to the imagination and finance of the MC campus. Many MC students, alumni, and friends went to the event, held in Townsend on Highway 321. Inside the "barn" was a curtain of streamers hung at the entrance to the barn, hiding the action inside. Descending from the entrance was a ramp that led to the dance floor. The railings and chairs along the ramp were decorated with multi-colored balloons. Candles and wax-graffiti paper tablecloths created a romantic ambience.

The MC students gyrated to a wide variety of music ranging from slow, romantic music to generic pop rock to heavy beating rap. Anyone who got thirsty or hungry from the rhythmic dancing could receive nourishment from soft drinks and hors d'oeuvres given out by Leslie Nier and Tolis Vouyioukas.

It was an evening of fun for everyone who was looking for a good time.

Women's tennis volley for victory

by Pam Gunter.

15-love, 30-love, 40-love. Those of you familiar with tennis recognize this scoring terminology. In a sport where love means zero, it means much more than nothing to the Lady Scots tennis team.

Yes, there is a women's varsity tennis team. It differs from the rest of the varsity teams on campus much more than just in the type of game the squad plays.

For instance, you won't find hordes of people watching them like in the stands for football games or soccer matches or on the side of the hill overlooking "rocky top" (where the women's soccer team is relegated to play - but that is another matter), nor can you distinguish any of the players by an uncommon haircut.

None of the current members were recruited, and in fact, most of the members never played on a team before coming to Maryville; a characteristic that no other varsity team has. They all recruit, which brings us to another distinguishing characteristic, the coach.

Coach David Cartlidge does not recruit not by choice but because he simply does not have the time. Why? Because he is a full-time professor, the only coach of a varsity sport so distinguished.

One last trait peculiar to the women's tennis team: they play no "home" matches. That is, they play no matches on the MC campus. (Aside from there only being three courts, which is not enough to reasonably play on, the pitiful condition of those three courts makes playing on them hazardous.) So in the best interest of the players on both teams and the college (to avoid a possible lawsuit if an injury were to occur), the team plays all its "home" matches at Maryville High School.

They get little, if any, support, they cannot play home matches, they cannot recruit players with experience, they play in a conference dominated by teams that can and do recruit, so why do they play?

According to the team members, which include Becky Shackelford, Pam Gunter, Ann Beaty, Vicky Wester, Michelle Smith, Rieko Matsutani, Charla Wardley, Jennifer Raper, and Gayle Bieber, they simply play for the fun of it.

You may be thinking that with all of these distinguishing characteristics, that it is a cover-up for a bad season. Quite the contrary. The team did more than hold their own.

During the regular season, the ladies beat Berea College, Cumberland College (twice), and Union College. They lost to the scholarship teams of Milligan College (twice) and Tennessee Tech (twice). They lost one match to Union College, but they were playing without their regular seedings.

The team concluded its season on the weekend of Oct. 20-21 with the conference tournament. As expected, the University of the South won.

The ladies finished ahead of Berea and held their own with Asbury, whom they went head-to-head against three times and won two out of the three.

Coach David Cartlidge said of this year's squad, "it was the most satisfying team I have ever coached." He said his satisfaction came from the vast improvement the squad made during the season.

Senior and number one seed Becky Shackelford had a fine season and advanced in the tournament until she played the player who eventually won her flight.

Pam Gunter, the only other senior on the squad, played at the second seed. She finished the season with a 4-2 record.

Juniors Ann Beaty and Vicky Wester shared the third position during the year and improved much over the course of the season.

Sophomore Michelle Smith played a various times at the fifth and sixth positions and bettered her skills throughout the season.

Freshmen Jennifer Raper and Rieko Matsutani came up with some confidence-building wins during the season at the sixth and fourth seed, respectively.

First-year player and sophomore Gayle Bieber improved drastically during the year and will be an asset to next year's squad.

Charla Wardley joined the team late in the season and brought a breath of fresh air while playing in exhibition.

Despite all of the obstacles, the team never made excuses. Doc (Coach Cartlidge) would always say if we lost then we lost to better players (or they were better that day).

"It's easier to take it if you lose to a better player, but winning isn't the main thing, playing and enjoying the game is," Shackelford explained.

So, the Lady Scots tennis team proved that you can play and compete on a varsity level and never lose sight of the real reason for playing - loving the sport and playing for the fun of it.

In only its second year, the women's soccer team has battled to an 11-9-1 record.

Coach Jerry Litton considered it a successful season because the ladies are "hard workers," he said.

The Maryville College Men's soccer team finished up the regular season last Tuesday in a somewhat lackluster fashion. And what has been an excellent

Coming off an impressive 5-0 win on the road against Berea College, the Scots travelled to Chattanooga Tuesday and played Tennessee Temple to a 1-1 stalemate. Coach Pepe Fernandez explained, "I was disappointed with the Temple game because we played really well, outshooting them like 39-12 and still winding up with a 1-1 tie."

Finishing with a 11-6-1 regular season record the Scots hosted the U.T. soccer club Friday, Nov. 3 and met with similar results. Senior Mike Rethwilm scored for M.C. in the first half only to see U.T. tie it early in the second half. The Scots outshot the Volunteers and had several potential game-winning goals blocked by the UT goal post.

With another winning season that includes wins over King and Lynchburg (two teams the Scots had never beaten), the men's soccer team is looking strong then ever.

Earlier, MC was looking for a national tournament bid if they could have beaten perennial powerhouses Emory and Hendrix and Scranton. But after playing E & H to a scoreless first half the Scots lost 3-0 and then fell to Scranton 3-0.

Concerning these losses Coach Fernandez quickly pointed out that he "was disappointed with the outcome but not with how we played. I think the team has really done a great job considering all the adversity that we had to go up against this season."

With an indoor soccer season that starts in December and with the help of a good recruiting year Coach Fernandez is looking to build on the success made by this year's team. Fernandez said, "we know this year that we were able to compete with the best teams in the nation and next year we will be out to beat them."

However, MC will have to win without their three seniors Randy Evans, Henry Marambio, and Mike Rethwilm, players that were keys to the Scot's offense and defense this year.

Randy Evans is MC's all time leading scorer and an All-American candidate. Henry Marambio, hampered by injuries early in the season, came on strong in the latter half as the Scot's goalkeeper. Mike Rethwilm has been a consistent scoring threat all season long. According to Coach Fernandez, "you just can't replace players like them." He added, "the big thing about the seniors is that if you look back before these three came here, Maryville never had a winning program and since Mike, Randy, and Henry have been here Maryville hasn't had a losing season. I really see these three players as turning the program around not just from a winning program, but one that receives a lot of national recognition."

finish with impressive record

The Lady Scots have relied upon the scoring of sophomore center forward Kelly Smelser (19 goals), and the assists of the team captain, junior center half Denise Amann (8).

"It took six games in which freshmen made the transition from high school to college," Coach Litton said.

A part of the young nucleus, freshman forward Sheila Proctor has been nominated and may become an All-American during her career. The team captain said, "It has been a good season and we have improved a lot."

With the team's youngness and desire they can only get better.

The Lady Scots have one game remaining in which they host the University of Indiana on Saturday the 11th at 10:30.

Homecoming victory first in a decade

by Stephen Williams

The Maryville College Fighting Scots football team ended a 10-year drought at Honaker Field with a victory for the home team on Saturday, Nov. 4. Not only was it a victory for the home team, but a Homecoming victory. And for all you Scots fans who aren't aware, the football team hadn't won a Homecoming game, until Saturday, since 1979.

The Scots came into the game against Campbellsville College with a 3-5 record and a win from the previous week. Campbellsville entered with a 2-5-1 record.

A defensive battle combined with sputtering offenses on both sides kept it from being the most exciting game, but plenty of excitement came with the win. Neither team seemed to be able to get its offense on track until late in the second quarter, when Scott Porter kicked a 30-yard field goal to put the Scots on top at the half.

The second half of the game was virtually identical to the first; both teams sputtered on offense without scoring a touchdown. Finally, midway through the fourth quarter Scott Porter kicked a 29-yard field goal to give the Scots a 6-0 lead over the Tigers.

When the Scots took possession after a failed fourth down conversion attempt by the Tigers, Porter's field goal proved to be the icing on the cake. The win puts the Scots just one win away from an even record.

The Scots rushed 52 times for 118 yards, completed 4 of 11 passes, fumbled once and received 4 penalties for 40 yards. The Tigers rushed 44 times for 167 yards, completed 1 of 12 passes, had 1 pass intercepted, fumbled four times and received 6 penalties for 75 yard.

Entrepreneur opportunities available for all majors

by Scott Brunger

Since many famous business leaders started businesses while in college, MC students should consider how their work experience in college might prepare them for their vocation. A recent Wall Street Journal article describes a ninety-five year old student-run business at Cornell University that began as a laundry service and now has expanded into fifteen businesses in computer rental. It receives a hundred new ideas yearly for starting new businesses and improving old ones.

On-campus and off-campus jobs give training as an employee, notable in responsibility, promptitude, and social skills. Some positions even give experience in the supervision of the work of others. However, the most diversified work experience comes to people responsible for their own business. Entrepreneurs must not only act as managers to plan, organize, staff, and supervise the business, but also take responsibility for finances, taxes and risk. A future employer will be impressed by job applicants who have demonstrated entrepreneurial experience in starting a successful business.

A number of business opportunities exist that could be started on a small scale in college and launched into careers later. I will classify them by major to demonstrate that almost any discipline in a liberal arts college provides job-related experiences.

Natural Sciences
The need for risk assessment for homeowners today is very great. At home we are exposed to hazardous substances that would be banned in the workplace. The current fear of radon in homes is only the beginning of the problem. Construction materials, furnishings, cleaning products, garden supplies, and automobiles—all expose us to an unhealthy environment at home. The increasing concern for energy efficiency leads to the sealing of homes in which the harmful fumes can accumulate.

Risk assessment would take samples of air and water in the home, survey architecture, heating-cooling systems, storage areas, and possessions and prepare an individualized report on risks. It would also propose plans and contractors to remedy their situation.

This business is complicated in terms of the scientific demands as well as legal responsibility. Adequate tests would have to be arranged for samples. Architectural advice sought since legal liability for health and safety is involved, the business would have to be set up as a limited liability corporation. Business procedures would have to be checked so that no unauthorized claims are made.

Education and Physical Education

The increasing number of affluent working parents introduces the possibility for an afterschool enrichment and fitness program of Perpetual Motion Day Care. An MC graduate has already moved into the gymnastics part of this market; other market niches exist.

The challenge in this business is to convince parents to pay for quality care, instead of exploiting underpaid babysitters to watch their children.

Office massages are also developing as a fad. A fifteen minute workover in a special chair costs ten to twenty dollars.

Religious Studies and Veterinary Medicine

Maryville College spends shocking amounts of resources on lawncare. Instead of creating landfill, air and noise pollution, the grass could serve as sheep fodder and fertilizer manufacture. The presence of sheep on campus would make the Bible stories more real to all of us. In the fall the sheep could be sold to Muslims to celebrate Ramadan, in the spring to Jews to celebrate Passover.

Computer Science and Communications

Though many consumers have purchased home computers, they lack the time to learn how to use them adequately. Computer manuals are often badly written and require complete mastery before even the index can be understood. Computer clubs demand too much time commitment for many neophytes. This business would provide a one-hour orientation at home for a nominal fee, and sell advice on software choices or problem-solving. A number of consultants with experience on various models of hardware using practical and recreational programs could serve as resources for computer consumers.

Communications majors will find that computer companies cannot find enough computer-literate writers to produce comprehensible explanations about their new equipment.

One Maryville alumnus founded Econographics of Knoxville, which provides economic data, marketing data to businesses, and advice on setting up computer systems.

Chemistry and Biology

Many members of the MC community appreciate culinary chemistry and botanical profusion. A cookie, cake, and brownie baking service or plant delivery would provide the kind of psychological pickup to survive midterms, comps, and term-papers.

Foreign Language and International Students

The internationalization of business requires communications across language barriers. In addition, non-profit organizations, such as academia, recreation groups, and youth exchanges must communicate in foreign languages. Certified interpreters and translators are extremely well paid, receiving $50 per hour for live interpretation or $20 per page for translation. Because of high prices charged by trained professionals, a market for interpretation and translation exists by organizations that do not require precise communication.

Maryville College has within its student body the capability to translate and to interpret many major international languages. This capability could be organized and made available through entrepreneurship.

I have not yet mentioned social science majors, since they are so commonly associated with business careers. While MC business administration and management majors are useful for future employees of large, sophisticated business organizations, they are not the only preparation for entrepreneurship. Though classes in accounting and management are useful before starting a business, a production, or service skill gained in another major is often necessary too. For this reason, many graduate business or management schools, such as the transfer program for the five-year M.B.A. at U.T. Knoxville, prefer that their candidates have experience in other majors rather than business.

Profs doubt education

(CPS) College professors think their students are not very well educated.

Three-fourths of the 5,000 college teachers queried last spring by the Carnegie foundation for the Advancement of Teaching said their undergraduate students are "seriously underprepared in the basic skills," preliminary data reveal.

Complete results of the survey, which the Washington, D.C.-based Carnegie group conducts every five years, will be released in November.

Professors at two-year schools complained most frequently, with 84 percent saying students lack basic skills. Sixty-five percent at liberal arts colleges said their pupils don't know enough.

Two-thirds of those surveyed thought colleges spend "too much time and money teaching students what they should have learned in high school."

The data, says Carnegie President Ernest Boyer, prove "the nation's public schools are disturbingly deficient."

To boost sagging language skills, Boyer proposed that all freshmen be required to take an expository writing class.

mountain children were not learning to read well, because they were not interested in available literature. He sent them to collect traditional mountain stories and write them down. When he published their stories, he discovered that they were very popular as authentic mountain lore. The result of responding to children's need for reading material is a successful magazine.

Art Simon is a social entrepreneur who founded Bread for the World in the 1970's. As a minister he organized a small prayer group that included his brother, Senator Paul Simon, that focused on the importance of food for the world's hungry. They realized that the Bible had a great deal to say about social justice and hunger, so they created a Christian lobbying group that would ask Christians to write letters to government officials about the problem of domestic and international hunger. This effort has resulted in funding of the WIC Program (Women, Infants, and Children Program), IFAD (the International Food and Development Program of the United Nations), and the Micro-credit of under $200 to poor entrepreneurs in developing countries. MC has a chapter of Bread for the World as part of the World Concerns Committee. At February Meetings, the religious emphasis week each spring, Rev. Simon was the speaker two years ago.

Lola Reid is a 1980's social entrepreneur in Alcoa, Tenn. She realized that hungry people have to wait several days to be processed through the food stamp program. In the meantime they grow hungrier. She organized a group of retired volunteers, rented a space in a dilapidated building and started the Blount County Food Pantry.

With financing from private contributions and food donated by companies, she listens to stories of poor people and gives out food, advice, and reprimands where needed. Though she is black, two-thirds of her applicants are white. She is not satisfied to provide charity alone, but also a political coalition to lobby politicians about the plight of the hungry in our community.

According to an authority on nonprofit organizations throughout the world, a comparison made in two business schools of final-year students planning to work as social entrepreneurs and those planning to work in profit-making businesses indicated the same level of academic achievement and organizational skills combined with very different personal motivations. There is an important place for social entrepreneurs in our world and it merits the same respect given to private entrepreneurs.

Trevor hosts symphony

Maestro Kirk Trevor, the Knoxville Symphony Orchestra's Music Director and Conductor, says that he and the KSO are committed to providing educational concerts in East Tennessee that are imaginative, entertaining, and fun.

One such concert is coming up, he says, on Sunday, November 19, at 3 p.m. in the Knoxville Civic Auditorium when the KSO presents a special public performance of its annual Young People's Concert. The concert is designed for the entire family at a popular price of only $5 for a reserved seat.

Trevor explained that this year's concert, entitled "Take A Ride On Kirk Trevor's Musical Time Machine," will be "especially fun for the entire family, not just the little ones, when I actually climb aboard my time machine and take the KSO on a musical journey through the ages right up to the present."

"We will make musical stops along the way in the 18th, 19th, and 20th centuries. We'll even be playing the theme from the popular movie series Indiana Jones," he added.

Trevor revealed that he is having a "time machine" built "complete with all the 'lights, bells, and whistles' you'd expect a time machine to have. I don't want to reveal too much about my time machine. It will be great fun on stage with the machine and the orchestra!"

Tickets to the November 19 public performance of the Young People's Concert are available at the Symphony office, at Proffitt's-Alcoa / Oak Ridge / East Towne / West Towne, and at the UT Central Ticket Office. The Symphony office is open Monday through Friday, 9 a.m. to 5 p.m., at 708 Gay Street, phone 523-1178. Major credit cards are accepted.

Students battle to lower drinking age limits

(CPS) Hoping to reverse a political movement toward prohibition and lower their drinking age limits, University of Wisconsin at Oshkosh students have staged a series of protests.

Both have ended in mass arrests, and have divided the campus. Acting Chancellor David Ward, for one, refused to take a stand on the drinking age issue, but has pledged to support students' efforts to lower it through political means.

"I don't see drinking being stopped" by the 21-year-old limit, said student body President Mike Furrner, noting that about 75 percent of the 11,917 students at Oshkosh are under 21. "Parties will continue. I'd rather it be in a controlled atmosphere (such as a bar)."

The higher drinking age at Oshkosh, as at other campuses around the country, effectively has led underage students in private apartments to set up bars of their own, often charging classmates they barely know money to draw beer from kegs.

To set an example for the school year, local police in September raided a "party" in the basement of some Oshkosh students' house, confiscating kegs, arresting 80 students and slapping the students who lived there with a $17,000 fine.

In response, Oshkosh students protested first on Oct. 12 and again on Oct. 19 in angry street demonstrations that led to 55 arrests and about $2,000 in property damage.

"The current situation," Ward wrote in a memo to university residents, "came out of the state's reluctant 21 standard age for drinking."

While asserting his support for town efforts to prevent students from running "illegal taverns," he said the campus would help support student efforts to get the drinking age lowered through political means.

"I will support a process that will allow (students) to debate the issue and put it in legislative form," Ward said.

Students, a UWO spokesman said, were upset that the fines levied on underage drinkers the Oshkosh campus were so much larger than the fines levied in crackdowns on underage drinkers arrested at other University of Wisconsin campuses.

R.E.M. rocks Knoxville crowds

by Heather Miller

R.E.M. rocked Knoxville Nov. 4 with their explosive rhythm and everlasting message. The band came on stage and began two hours of exciting verse with "Stand." They definitely know how to get a crowd on their feet and moving.

R.E.M. introduced themselves and gave a few simple instructions, which were flashed on an overhead screen. They told the crowd to be courteous to others and not to scream "Radio free Europe" during the quiet parts of the songs. The meaning was too important not to be heard.

The concert then dove into upbeat, fast paced songs. I could not find ten people in the crowd who were sitting. Everyone was up and dancing. They played many of my favorites such as "Orange Crush", "Pop Song '89", and "World Leader Pretend".

I was very impressed with their involvement in political issues and organizations. Greenpeace had a booth set up during the concert, and R.E.M. encouraged the crowd to participate in their efforts. Pulling together for the improvement of the world is what the band is all about.

R.E.M.'s performance also included many of their older tunes, the mixture of songs from past albums combined well with the newer material of "Green". The concert definitely lived up to high expectations. Needless to say, I did not leave disappointed.

I should mention something about the opening group, Pylon. I was not very impressed by them. I found their music to be very repetitive and unoriginal.

I was relieved when they were finally finished, and more than ready for R.E.M. to perform. Their refreshing and compelling performance more than made a lasting impression on the audience. Their songs were, in their own words, "about individual and political activism written especially for you."

The

Bus Stop displays promising talent

by Kathleen McArthur

This fall's production of "Bus Stop" brought a combination of old and new faces into the spotlight. Continuing their wonderful appearances on stage were: Trish Lunsford as Grace; Rees Cramer as Will; Charlotte Borderieux as Cherie; and John Worth as Carl. There were also a lot of fresh, new talents appearing on the stage with David Garzone as Dr. Lyman, Andi Bristol as Emma, Greg Basham as Bo, and Charles Bedoian as Virgil. This mixture proved to be a spectacular asset to MC's stage.

The play deals with love and friendship, which inevitably brings up the question of how the real meanings of each exist in society.

The characters have been stranded in Kansas City at a bus stop called "Grace's Diner."

Because of hazardous weather conditions, they are forced to spend the night. The audience sees the characters involved in individual relationships, struggling to become accepted by the person with whom they are communicating.

Grace, the high-spirited manager of the diner, "entertains" the bus driver, Carl, in her upstairs apartment. Dr. Lyman is a highly educated eccentric with a passion for classic literature, booze, and young girls. He becomes instantly taken by Emma, a naive high-school student who works for Grace in the afternoons. Bo is a rambunctious rodeo circuit rider. He has taken Cherie, a night-club singer, against her will because he wants to marry her. Both have a lot to learn about love, as well as each other. Virgil is Bo's long-time companion, and he serves as a father figure and true friend.

All the characters face the realities of loving relationships and choose the path which seems to suit them best.

One actor of special notice was David Garzone in his role of Dr. Lyman. The vitality he put forth brought the character to life on stage. His body movement and tone of voice seemed to be the essence of the real doctor, highly intoxicated and mentally unstable. He was definitely a welcomed member to the cast.

Congratulations to Alan Reihl and the production staff on the realistic and creative set. It was one of the best ever at MC.

The cast, director, and staff deserve a round of applause for this first production of the 1989-90 year. If "Bus Stop" is any indication of the fantastic potential in theatre, the campus and community are in for a real treat.

Recital recants past

by Mark Koerber

The Homecoming Reception at Willard House on November 3 turned out a host of alumni onstage and off. Many staff and faculty members joined alumni for an evening of entertainment provided by the newly formed Foothills Theatre Company, Inc. (FTC, Inc.)

FTC, Inc. presented an original musical review entitled "Six Decades of Song" featuring musical selections beginning with the 1930's hit "All of Me" and closing with an a capella rendition of Tracy Chapman's "Behind the Walls."

FTC, Inc. was formed by alumni, staff, and friends of Maryville College for the purpose of providing a broader range of performance and theatre business opportunities for Blount County.

Charter members of FTC, Inc. include alumni Jeff Hayes, Nancy Hayes, Mark Beyer, Diane Barr, Maelea Fiore; MC staff members Sandy Brennan, Tim Bryant, and Mark Koerber and Kathy Fiore whose brother was a much-loved member of the MC community.

The cast for "Six Decades of Song" included alumni Ger Burnette (director), Kim Spargo-Burnette, Jewel Quintana and Kevin Carothers.

FTC, Inc. president Mark Koerber expressed his feelings about the evening. "We are delighted with the calibre of talent represented here and appreciate this opportunity. It has provided for FTC, Inc. Thanks to Ellie Koella for her confidence in us and to Ger Burnette for his excellent direction and for his time. And a thank you to all the cast members and crew."

Santa's List & Christmas Perspectives

Families - Students exchange cultures

by Jeff Huffman

"Adopt-A-Family" is a project which finds host families for the international student, who is far from home and wanting to know the culture. The international exchange student needs those who would be willing to devote their time and patience in teaching the ways of the land and its people, which is the purpose of "Adopt-A-Family".

These students come from Japan, Gambia, India, and a host of other countries. The cultures differ greatly from the United States. Most of these students have no transportation, no prior knowledge of the area, and no opportunity to participate in everyday American activities.

With "Adopt-A-Family", the students can eat pizza with friends, go shopping at East Towne, or watch a Big Orange football game.

Many families hesitate to invite a student into their homes, fearing that this new person would get incredibly bored with them or be a really horrible person. This rarely happens.

After some hard work though, 27 host families were established, a sufficient number for the amount of international students this year.

Mr. Robert Hutchens, the one in charge of the "Adopt-A-Family" program, said "It's a wonderful opportunity. I'd like to see more of those cases where they (the student and the family) form a real attachment." He also added that "it means a lot to international students."

If there are any international students who need a host family, or any family who would like to help out a foreign student and learn about a different culture, contact: Mr. Robert Hutchens, Anderson Hall, third floor.

'Tis the season . . . Heifer Project gives

by Jeff Huffman

Moool! Baaahhh! Cock-a-doodle-doo! Every student who ate in Pearsons this week was met by these sounds, promoting the Heifer Project, a campaign designed to send farm animals to those who need them in different parts of the world.

The Bread for the World group started a weeklong campaign to raise money for the Heifer project. Dr. Scott Brunger, faculty advisor of Bread for the World, said "This is a way to remember them (friends and family) without buying more junk."

During lunchtime, Christmas cards were sold. In order for one to buy the cards, they had their choice of paying $1 for bees or chicks, $3 for sheep or goats, $5 for pigs, and $10 for calves. The customer would then send a card, specifying who the card would be sent in honor of. These animals will be sent to those countries in need of farm animals, so that they may start a new generation of bees, chickens, goats, sheep, pigs, and cows.

Last year, the project raised $170, and this year there is hope of even more money being raised. Ole MacDonald may get his farm.

Earth Day 1990: world event at MC

by Jeff Huffman

The name "Earth Day 1990" is the signature for a gigantic global project set on April 22, 1990 to promote the suffering of the environment and to present the solutions needed to help it. Maryville College will participate in this worldwide event, and many MC personnel are invited to help in the precedent-setting event.

"Earth Day 1990" took its name from its parent, the original "Earth Day". This event, which took place in 1970, was the largest organized demonstration in history. Over 20 million people participated in the event through various activities, ranging from nature walks to exact action on major biosphere polluters.

That day, the Mayor of New York banned automobiles from fifth avenue and 100,000 people joined in an "eco-fair" at Union Square. As a result of this "Earth Day", the clean air you are breathing on campus, in Knoxville, or anywhere else in America, is cleaner than it was 20 years ago. The environment was in a state of siege. The EPA (Environmental Protection Agency) was a direct result of "Earth Day" actions, and today it is watching the environment, restricting where necessary for a cleaner nation. The Clean Air Act and the Clean Water Act were also established.

Although many of the environmental problems of twenty years ago have been handled, there are new threats to our planet: Greenhouse gases, ozone holes, acid rain, toxic wastes, expanding deserts, and shrinking rainforests. That's why "Earth Day 1990" will happen.

Christmas doesn't have to come in a box

Are you still fretting over the 'perfect' gift? Okay, maybe you can't afford perfect so you're ready to settle for the 'hope this will do' gift. Or if you are in a really bad fix, you're looking for the 'I'm buying because they are' gift or the 'just to have something under the tree' gift. In any case, take heart, or perhaps take to heart, the three best gifts of any lifetime, satisfaction guaranteed.

The first gift idea is for the intellectual type, that is, for anyone who belongs to the human race. It is a gift that enables man to question his universe and know he is an integral part of its greatness. It gives purpose and direction. It doesn't need batteries but it does require soul-searching. St. Augustine said it best, "...therefore seek not to understand that you may believe, but believe that you may understand." It is the size of a mustard seed and it moves mountains.

The second gift is in rare supply today. Its short supply is not because of high demand particularly, but because society sometimes underestimates such a commodity. Yet, it is used by many when the sun peeks over the new day, when countries merge to talk of peace, when the "world is too much with us." It comes equipped with hugs and warmly clasped hands and is found in bright faces and God's promises.

The third gift varies in shades and colors, but never varies in degrees of quality. It is, as it happens, the most requested gift of the last millennium. It reunites families and creates new ones. It bridges nations and mends lives. It has no expiration date, no boundaries. One size fits all. It is appropriate for all ages--"from one to ninety-two." Plus it is the only Christmas gift with a rebate...you always get something in return.

So if you haven't checked off all the names on your Santa list, or even if you have, maybe you should check it twice. Double check the inspiration -- see if it is an oversized elf or a small baby boy.

"There are three things that remain--faith, hope, and love--but the greatest of these is love."

by Travis Crabtree

Here's an innovative idea, let's do something about the once and future mediocrity that will soon permeate this campus, stifling the academic respectability of MC, but which will be allowed to exist by the administration because it doesn't take effort to maintain the revered status quo.

To do this, a look at the origins and original purpose of the college desperately needs to be taken. It was born a true liberal arts college with the intent to cultivate the topsoil of the mind. At one time, a hard look would need to be taken to find other Southern schools which could surpass MC in academic credibility and in the various fields in which it had graduates as leaders. Now, the tarnished character encourages students to close their eyes so as not to see the rusty dilapidation of the school.

But rejoice for MC is not beyond academic salvation, if only the administration sees the need for academic rejuvenation and stretches out a hand to accept the changes that should be made to once again give MC the reputation that the early college leaders worked so long and hard for.

Accepting this challenge would require the administration (other than staying on campus) to re-examine exactly what the purpose of a liberal arts college in contemporary America really is. A shock and mild heartburn await them. Maryville seems to have deviated from the original purpose that the founders aspired to. Thousands of other schools now do (and can do better) the present purpose of the school, technical business.

Now it is foolhardy and slamming to contemporary education to introduce the idea of removing business from Maryville. In the proper context, business is a rightful and needed course in a college such as MC was intended to be. However, the administration has loosened the reins that it once had on the objective of the MC experience, and the teaching of business for its own sake, and only for its own sake, has materialized as the primary concern of present-day MC.

Only a handful of schools remain in the South that do what MC should be doing, teaching the liberal-arts and humanities. MC could excel at this task, and that is what is so depressing and sad about modern MC: potential is not being realized.

A look at the credentials of the faculty make it certain that a fine, new MC could be resuscitated in a short time. Most faculty are tacitly aware of the current problems and have originated many ideas on ways to correct them or are at least open to new methods of operation since the present methods are such a diversion from a true liberal tradition.

The business majors are not the problem. They are earnest students of that credible field of education; the problem is the lack of a vision for MC, in the present and the future.

Most students at MC are here because it is perceived as a small college well-versed in the teaching

President Bush and President Gorbachev's summit at Malta has, by even the most virulent cold-warrior's appraisal, signaled the beginnings of a new era in U.S./Soviet relations. Whether the Soviet's system is in the "dust-bin of history" or just going through the transition process long predicted by Socialist theorists, little doubt remains as to Gorbachev's desire to redefine the division of East from West. Events in eastern Europe reinforce the Soviet's craving for peace and their incapacity to maintain empire. Their refusal to militarily support Communist hard-liners

Malta frees dollars

in their supposed client states leaves them little reason to support armies in eastern Europe. Soviet society, burdened with an inordinate military budget, demands the immediate transformation from war production to consumer goods production if it is ever to see itself become the Democratic-Socialist state dreamed of by Marx. The failure to provide a decent standard of living for its citizens while competing for world domination has found the Soviet Union suing for peace.

The prospect of peace, even if only in the European community, portends exciting developments for citizens of both the Soviet Union and the United States. For the Soviets it will mean increased consumer goods production. In the U.S. it could signal an equally dramatic reduction in military spending: 60% of the U.S. military budget is spent in defense of Europe. The possibility of reducing even half that expenditure would free billions of dollars for other purposes.

The prospect of a peaceful Europe has excited opinion makers on both sides of the U.S. political mainstream. And the excitement builds over what to do with the "peace dividend"--the moneys saved when we remove our troops and equipment from Europe. Conservatives, convinced that the growing U.S. deficit threatens our economic security, see an immediate pay-down on the U.S. debt as the only reasonable use of the funds saved by military reductions. Liberals, with visions of national health insurance, subsidized housing, head-start programs and other frivolous "special interest" programs dancing in their heads, can only envision goodies which will strengthen their electoral positions. But both seem to have

Christmas should mean more

by Amirou Willingham

Some people don't celebrate Christmas because it is simply too materialistic.

Many seem to be caught up in a game of superficial foolishness. A game that leaves many people in debt because they try to please others with expensive gifts that they knowingly can't afford.

This game exhausts people at shopping malls and they literally go crazy. Some fight each other at the sales racks.

Some even dread the fact that they may give a person a gift and not receive one in return. Come on now, there isn't any need for all of that.

Have we forgotten the true meaning of Christmas? It is celebrating the birth of Christ through a giving of ourselves to help mankind.

The true essence of Christmas should not be covered up with non-spiritual, external foolishness.

What we should concern ourselves with is how we can help those who are less fortunate than we are, abroad and at home. Do we think about South Africa, Ethiopia, Central America, the Middle East, and other parts of the world that are suffering from political and economic strife?

Christmas in America is becoming more and more falsified and misunderstood every year. It is that "joyous time of the year" and many of us "get the holiday spirit" and channel our energies in the wrong places.

'Tis the season to be stupid . . . or what?

by Tim Lister

As soon as Thanksgiving dinner becomes leftovers and the cries of bargain hunters' children fill the mall, a certain ignorance fills the feeble minds of those that celebrate the holidays. It's Christmas time and 'tis the season for stupidity.

Christmas is a time when people wear ridiculous outfits. Does the fact that they look like candy canes correspond to their mentality? And, what does it mean when a person's clothes are decorated with an overweight recluse or a genetically defective reindeer? If people are going to dress like mental midgets, then they should do it at Santa's Workshop.

Christmas is a time for giving. Yeah, right.

Exchanging gifts should be done away with completely. Why spend hard-earned money on a present for an person who will probably exchange the gift anyway? (Or leave it on the closet shelf for three years!)

Christmas is a time for hypocrisy. People travel around the globe to see family or friends that they talk to once a year. They spend time with family members they met when they were eight months old and struggle to remember their names for the duration of the holiday, but still act like they actually missed the forgotten relative.

I have yet to understand why some people decorate their trees the way they do. Throwing plastic strips of silver on a tree really captures the essence of Christmas. Some people pay to have their tree painted white to give the illusion of it being covered with snow flakes. I would say flakes is a key word.

Throwing lights all over a house is also a nice touch for the season. Ceramic deer and pink flamingos in the front yard aren't enough?

This is also the only time when the whole world is color blind. This is the season when red and green go together. Red and green...gross.

Christmas -- bah, humbug.

Let's get excited about helping those less fortunate than we are, but not only at Christmas, but everyday of our lives.

Spotlight On:

Commissioner Williams

by Stephen Williams

Recently, I had the chance to visit with Blount County Commissioner Richard Williams Jr. While visiting his home, I took the time to ask Williams a few questions.

Williams was appointed to fill the vacant seat of county commissioner after the death of County Commissioner Wilfred Warren.

Williams resides in Alcoa, Tennessee with his wife Evelyn and three grandchildren. After completing the appointment, Williams was elected with 70 percent majority over his democratic opponent to represent the first commission district which is composed of both black and white residents.

Since being elected, Williams has been appointed, or in some cases elected, to such committees as the Committee on Committees, Cable Authority, Highway Committee, Airport Hazard Committee, and the Community Action Committee.

Williams graduated from the Alcoa school system, then attended Fort Gordon Institute for Leadership (Military School) in Fort Gordon, GA. He also served in the Military Police Force American Far East Command during the Korean War.

Highland Echo: "How long have you been a member of the Blount County community?"

Richard Williams: "I've been a member of this community all of my life."

HE: "How long have you been involved in politics?"

RW: "I've been involved in politics ever since I was ten year old. At that age, all I did was go door to door passing out leaflets for politicians that were running and that my family supported."

HE: "Are there any other members of your family involved in politics in this area?"

RW: "Yes I do, My younger brother, George, is a member of the Alcoa School System and I have a cousin, John Louis, who is a senator for Georgia."

HE: "Are you the first black to be elected in Blount County?"

RW: "No, I'm the third black to serve on the county court in Blount County."

HE: "What specifically is your job as County Commissioner?"

RW: "My job is to provide a better form of government for the people, and to make decisions that the community can't make."

HE: "Why do you think the people of this county elected you as commissioner?"

RW: "I know they elected me because I have a love for the people of this community, and they knew that I wanted to help them, especially the women, minorities, and the less fortunate. I've been a member of this community all of my life and the people that live here know my attitude and my feelings toward them."

HE: "What are some of your goals for this community?"

RW: "I would like to see the better education for the people, better paying jobs, the elimination of child abuse, drug addiction, clean air, and preservation of the land. I would also like to see better police protection for the people and the lowest tax rates. Most of all, I just want to live in a house by the side of the road and be a friend to my fellow man."

HE: "You mentioned that you would like to see the elimination of drugs and alcoholism. What steps are you taking to make that a reality?"

RW: "Well, basically we've set up seminars to educate people on those issues, along with work sessions and counselling. We have worked with churches and other organizations to reach out to the people that need help."

HE: "In light of your wanting to create better paying jobs, how do you feel about the Japanese companies that are coming into the area?"

RW: "I welcome the Japanese industry that is coming into this area. I welcome all legitimate industries. It's better to make a product here than to buy it from another country. That way, if we make what we need, the money stays here."

HE: "What made you get into politics seriously?"

RW: "The need for better government. I wanted to pursue a better government so it would be more sound and effective; so that we officials can adhere to the needs of the people we love. I want to ensure the people's domestic tranquility and promote their general welfare."

HE: "Did your military experience have anything to do with your political career?"

RW: "Yes it did. It taught me to pursue the principles I believe in and not to take no for an answer when defending them. I've had training in the military, political science, and in other areas that I am not at liberty to talk about. So yes, my military experience did affect my present career."

HE: "What are your goals for the future?"

RW: "For this area I would like to see an art museum, something to recognize the people that have contributed to the history of Blount County as well as to house artifacts, historic relics, and momentos of days gone by so future generations will recognize the contributions and sacrifices that were given so they could have a better place to live. Frankly, I don't believe you can render a decision on a future if you have no historical knowledge of a past."

Afterwards, Williams and I talked about some of his personal beliefs. He took me into his garage and showed me a bridle for a mule. He said that every day he comes into his garage and looks at the bridle. When asked why he holds such a vigil, Williams responded, "When I was a boy I had to guide the mule that wore this bridle. Those were hard times for me. Now that I don't have to do that anymore, I've put this bridle in here to remind me where I came from and I will never forget that. It also reminds me that I am no better than any other person because we all started with nothing and we will all leave this earth with nothing."

King twist twins

by Stephen Williams

If you haven't read a good book lately, I strongly suggest you read Stephen King's new novel, The

B-52's Make 'Cosmic' comeback

by Skip Heverly

New Jersey where young Thad Beaumont is discovering his writing talent. However Thad begins to have small headaches that grow worse as time passed. They were normal headaches except for the fact that each headache Thad had would begin with the chirping sounds of sparrows. Not just one or two sparrows, but thousand, even millions at times. There was nothing Thad could do for these headaches but bare with them.

Then one day Thad heard the sparrows as if the entire planet was infested with them. But this time the sparrows did not precede a headache, they preceded a seizure.

Thad's parents rushed him to the hospital and the doctors took x-rays of Thad's head and discovered a tumor and recommended surgery. When the surgeon cut into Thad's forehead, a tumor was not what he found. But he did find an eyeball and a couple of fingernails.

General hysteria flooded the O.R. After calm was restored, the doctor explained that in some rare cases a mother may be pregnant with twins, but by an unknown phenomenon one twin may absorb the other. Thus, parts of the absorbed fetus may grow in the body of the surviving child. After explaining the probable situation, the doctor removed the eyeball and fingernails from Thad's brain. He did not tell Thad or his parents. To them it was an operation in which a tumor was removed from their son's head.

The years went by, and Thad became a famous novelist. Except Thad wasn't writing under his real name, but was using the pseudonym George Stark.

After writing a number of successful novels under his pseudonym, Thad decided to George Stark. However, the night after the photo session, the caretaker of the cemetery notices that the fake grave of George Stark has been dug up.

It wouldn't have been so bad if he didn't also notice that the grave had been dug up from the inside. And to make things worse, there were footprints leading away from the grave instead of into it.

Following the discovery of the empty grave, murders start to occur. Not just the murders of ordinary people, but those of all the people involved in the revealing of George Stark's true identity.

The strange thing about all of the murders is that Thad's fingerprints are pasted all over the scene and in two of the murder scenes the words THE SPARROWS ARE FLYING AGAIN.

The rest of the story is filled with psychological twist and turns that leaves the reader shocked. Thad discovers that the man that has been harassing him and has kidnapped his family is actually George Stark. He is also the ghost of his absorbed twin brother who has re-created himself, with a little help from Thad.

George wants Thad to write one more novel under the Stark pseudonym because if he doesn't Stark will die.

So where do the sparrows come in? Well I couldn't just tell you the entire story, could I? So go out and buy the book and find out for yourself.

If you've never read a Stephen King novel before, you can expect an experience filled with satirical humor and nerve raking horror. For all of us who have read King's works, you will not be disappointed.

Simple Recipe for Holiday Fun

- 4. For each cookie, roll 1 teaspoon of dough from each half back and forth on lightly floured surface into 4-inch rope. Place 1 red and 1 white rope side by side; press together lightly and twist. Mix candy and sugar; immediately sprinkle over cookies. Remove from cookie sheet.

cool, and looser. For all of the strange-o's who jumped on the B-52 bandwagon at the beginning of the 80's, this song may strike a note of longing for carefree youth.

"Deadbeat Club" is followed by "Love Shack," the album's highlight and the band's biggest single ever. It's ever so catchy, and like so much of the B-52's, it's F-U-N! Woo! Next is "Junebug," which thus far has not received much airplay, but is nonetheless a burning dance number in which they pull out all the stops.

Side two lacks the brilliance of side one, but "Channel Z," the album's second biggest hit, is noteworthy. Through some neat vocals and a catchy, punchy tune, the B-52's express simple but worthwhile lyrics of world-weariness and realistic cynicism. Lastly is the environmentally focused "Topaz," exalting in nature's beauty. It is a nice, relaxing song that adds to the balance of this fine album.

While not so original and fresh as they were ten years ago, the B-52's show no lack of confidence with "Cosmic Thing" and do what they do best, which they do better, and with more style, than anyone else. This probably isn't the best album of '89, but isn't it worth $10 just to find out how fun the "t.v. generation" really was?!

Liza, with new Pets, surges into charts

by Travis Crabtree

With the reverberation machine in full effect and synthesizers pulsating new harmonies, Liza Minelli has jumped from the aging Las Vegas style music into a totally new realm for both her and her fans. Who does Minelli have to thank for giving her career a booster shot? None other than those boys from the pet shop.

The Pet Shop Boys seem to have a knack for revitalizing the careers of one-time pop queens. They first brought back Dusty Springfield in the number one hit "What Have I Done to Deserve This?"; and now they present Minelli back before the public with a new single from her album which they exclusively produced.

The 12" version of "Losing My Mind" entered the Billboard Hot Dance chart with a bullet at number 12 and will probably enter the top ten next week. Chris Lowe (the synthethist for the PSB) spreads his influence over the entire song, but he is especially noticeable in the introduction as he harnesses the bass line and some unique "scratching" to produce a sound which instantly pulls the listener into the tune. From there, Neil Tennant, the PSB's vocalist, lays down the repeating chorus for the song. He fades out, and Minelli instantly takes control. The contrast between Tennant's and Minelli's voices - Tennant's is almost two octaves higher - gives the song a unique texture and leaves the listener wanting to hear Tennant again in the song. However, the rest of the tune is all Minelli's which the occasional "scratch" or synthesizer solo by Lowe.

Although the Pet Shop Boys produced the album, Julian Mendelsohn who mixed the Boy's remake of "Always On My Mind" was called in to remix the extendeds. Included on the 12" are four different versions of the song, each with emphasis on a different component of the song: Minelli, Tennant, Lowe's keyboards, and the bass line.

With the success of Minelli's album almost assured, one can only wonder about who the Boy's will revive next. But until that announcement comes, the fans of both Minelli and the PSB can enjoy the music that was produced by this truly unique collaboration. Where's Dean Martin?

Students share shocks and stories

by Jeff Huffman

The "Reports From the Field" series is a new informational program beginning its first year at Maryville College. Each program is presented by previous MC exchange students who have visited such countries as Japan, Germany, Spain, Korea, and Mexico.

In the most recent of the series, Heather Huffman and Noel Royer spoke of their experiences in Japan. Both made many remarks about life outside the school in Japan. Huffman told of dorm life with the Japanese, Australians, and other foreigners, while Noel Royer told of home life while living with a host family.

Both travelers gave extensive explanation of what the country is like, with its millions of people and difficult language. They admitted that it did have an effect on their lives, and that they would never forget it.

In previous presentations, other traveling veterans have spoken on their experiences abroad, both in and out of college. Anything can happen, ranging from a marriage proposal from a married man to playing frisbee in the nude.

Joan Worley, Library Director, said "I think it's been fun for everyone who listens and speaks."

The program is designed to inspire other MC students to travel abroad, experiencing different cultures and other aspects that will make an memorable mark upon their lives.

"Reports From the Field" has taken place on Thursday mornings absent of Community Forums. Another "Report From the Field" is planned for sometime in February. It is hoped that the program will grow, adding more countries to its list as each year comes along.

Admissions defends enrollment increase

(Part I of a series)

by Christen Anderson

MC student enrollment has risen significantly in the past three years, from 676 in 1986 to the present count of 856 students. Although the college community is pleased with the increased enrollment, many people are questioning the quality of the new students who are being admitted. In other words, are students with low test scores and GPA's being accepted just so the college can make money? The answer is no.

While the enrollment has increased, overall test scores and GPA's have not dropped drastically. The average ACT score for freshmen has been 21 for the past three years, and the average SAT scores have ranged from 965 in 1987, 937 in 1988, and 939 in 1989. The number of students ranked in the top fifth percent of their class in secondary school has increased from 38% in 1987 to the present 46%. Students applying to MC are judged on their grades in English, math, science, language, social studies, and their ACT or SAT scores. According to Assistant Director of Admissions Steve King, students are selected by whether they will be successful at MC.

"It's unethical to admit students who won't be able to handle the work load," King said.

Why are more students attending MC? According to King, there are several factors that have led to the enrollment increase.

"Our primary focus is to build on the college's image -- we are now using videos that are mailed to prospective students and show the improvements that have been made on campus," King said.

King stated that he emphasizes the liberal arts aspect of the college, the close faculty-student relationships, and the college's ties with the Presbyterian church when he talks with prospective students.

"Our mountain challenge program, independent study, and interim distinguish MC from other liberal arts schools," King said.

Another vital factor in the increased enrollment is the availability of more financial aid. King explained, "The college made a decision to increase financial aid, and that is the main reason for the higher enrollment."

Many students complain about the high cost of tuition at MC in response to this question, King said, "There are numerous reasons for the cost of tuition - insurance and utilities are just a few. Also, in order to further MC's reputation, we need money to attract good professors."

Men's basketball takes off in a leap of victory

by Jeff Huffman

The Intramural Football season came to a close with the Yardapes winning the championship in the final game on Sunday, December 3.

Five teams made up the rosters for this year's rivalry.

The Yardapes, 5-1 for the season, battled to the championship title holders.

The 69'ers, 4-2, took second place after their defeat to the Yardapes.

The B-Ball Bozos, 3-2 for the year, took over the number three position after losing in the semifinals.

Intramural I ended their season at 1-4, throwing them into fourth place.

The Pearson Pickups finished 0-4, putting them at the bottom of the pile-up in fifth place.

The 69'ers defeated Intramural I while the Yardapes won over the B-Ball Bozos in semifinals held on Wednesday, November 30.

After the championship win, Mark Roane, blocker, rusher, and reciever, yelled "We're going to Disneyworld!"

Few jocks do coke--chew, drink instead

(CPS) -- Fewer college athletes are using cocaine, but more are drinking alcohol, chewing tobacco and injecting anabolic steroids than four years ago, a study released in mid-November suggests.

Only 5 percent of about 2000 student athletes surveyed nationwide by Michigan State University researchers said they had used cocaine during the past year, compared to 17 percent in 1985. In the same survey, 16 percent of the general college population reported using cocaine.

However, about 89 percent of the athletes said they had consumed alcohol in the past year. About 5 percent of athletes said they use steroids, a slight increase from 1985.

Separately, a 1986 Ohio State University survey found that 20 to 25 percent of college athletes nationwide used cocaine or marijuana at least once a week.

MSU researchers also discovered a 40 percent increase in the number of athletes who said they chew tobacco.

"This just flies in the face of any and all efforts at education," said William Anderson, the survey's director.

Costner displays imagination/talent

by Kathy McArthur

On Saturday night, Julie Costner presented her senior show to the student body from 7-11 p.m. There was an array of good food and music provided by "Exit 65."

The work is dated from 1985 until the present. She displayed unbelievable talent in a brilliant array of color.

The show consisted of acrylic paintings, sculptures, photography, and numerous drawings in pencil, pastels, colored pencils, and markers.

Her subject matter varied from abstracts to portrait sketches. Costner also included many familiar MC faces disguised in eccentric photographic detailing. Each creation was a representation and extension of its artist.

Costner ended the show with a sculpture entitled "Acid Bath." It provided an exceptional finale and completed the overall tone of the exhibit.

When asked about the origin of the piece, Costner stated, "It was originally a mermaid, but I was informed that I was using the same prevalent figure in most of my work. I became furious and changed it to symbolize my own anger through a person burning in a bath of acid."

Costner admitted that her mood affected the outcome of her art. She explained, "Lately I've been triggered by a lot of bad experiences; therefore, I've really put out some nerve-racking drawings. When I'm calm, I usually don't draw - I just absorb ideas from things I experience, then when I'm full of ideas I record them." The result is a thought-provoking piece created from emotion.

There was a guest book at the entrance of the exhibit expressing the overwhelming satisfaction of the visiting viewers.

Costner encouraged any comments on her art. "I have mixed emotions. I enjoy any constructive criticisms, however I feel my work falls into the non-constructive category. My work is stereotyped at times as being drug related, especially photography. It is important that individuals arrive at their own conclusions. Unfortunately, these stereotypes cloud up individual opinion."

After graduation in December, Costner plans to move to Nashville and approach record companies such as Warner Bros., Motown, and Chrysalis with her work. Through the help of friends, she also hopes to market her work in poster form in the psychedelic shops of Los Angeles during New Year's Grateful Dead performances. After a few years, Costner hopes to get a master's degree in studio art and to teach.

The show will be running until the end of the semester. Students are encouraged to view the work from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m.

GET YOURS WHILE THEY LAST

The 1989 Chilhowean is in the process at being delivered to students and graduated seniors.

Because of budget restraints, the number ordered was reduced.

Therefore all faculty and staff will probably not receive personal copies.

However, after all student copies have been issued, every attempt will be made to supply at least each office with a complimentary copy. Of course, any extras will be distributed accordingly.

Another factor playing in the yearbook delay is the publisher's fault. Almost 200 books were shipped back to the Taylor warehouse for corrections.

Gilmore assisted

by Heather Miller

Trent Gilmore, a 1989 graduate of Maryville College, was honored with a benefit concert on November 12. The proceeds assisted Gilmore to relieve the financial strain since his hip surgery due to arthritis. Many of the local churches' gospel choirs performed. Among them were the Rest Haven Baptist Church Chamber Choir from Alcoa, and the Mount Zion Baptist Church Gospel Choir. Other groups that performed were Jerry and Paul Coker, the christian rock band Surrender, and Dave Yocom, southern rock band High Water.

The best group was Trent's choir, the Hall-Oldfield Community Choir. This group is made up entirely of young people ranging in age from 11 to 21. The sound was rich and soulful. They are definitely a source of pride in Trent. During the concert, many people remarked about Trent's talents. Seeing so many groups come together for his benefit proves he has many fans.

Tradition begins at CCM

by Heather Miller

On December 3, the CCM held their Hanging of the Greens at their annual Moravian Love Feast.

A Moravian Love Feast is a traditional gathering of the Moravian Brethren, who began the first Protestant branch. They came to be about a hundred years before Martin Luther.

The feast symbolized fellowship and a welcoming of Christ to them. The traditional meal consisted of a simple bun and a drink such as tea. The service was performed by Dr. Glen Hewitt and the music was by Dr. James Bloy. The mixture of students, faculty, and staff sang many of the traditional Christmas carols and partook the buns and tea.

A very touching service, it would be a welcome tradition.

Division of a nation, echoes from the past

by Jana Dalton

It's 1961 in Darmstadt, Germany. An East Tennessee couple, 19 and 21, are newly married, new to the service and far from home. Long before CNN reporting or express mail, let alone transcontinental phone lines, a radio announcement hurls them into a flurry of fear and uncertainty. Overnight their world is turned into a chaotic series of events.

The Armed Forces Network (AFN), the military broadcast station, announces that a barbed wire fence has been erected at the Brandenburg gate, severing Germany. The military has been called to emergency alert status.

Gene McCarter, member of the 32nd Army Signal Corp, is whisked away to the field, location - security material, destination - the Berlin wall.

His wife, Gail McCarter, is issued evacuation cards and is told to prepare for departure at a moments notice. Next all civilians are issued dog tags--which serve but one purpose.

With only the AFN radio to inform them of the progress made daily on the wall, they fear that war will be declared, or she will be evacuated, or he will be relocated. They have no contact with each other.

Imagine surviving this scenario for three weeks. After the initial hubbub, the situation brewed at high heat for nine months.

"When I realized what was happening [with the iron curtain], I was really scared" said McCarter looking back on that period of her life. "You didn't know what they (the Soviets?) were going to do, if we were going to declare war or not. But (the wall) was a threat."

She recalled the confusion of those days saying that there were reports of troops at the wall doing "loud growling" but no real reaction. "We made loud threats about human rights, restricting people from their families and jobs. I really thought we'd knock it down" she reflected. "But," she added, "that was a very patriotic time and we all supported whatever decisions our leaders made."

And when the wall came tumbling down, she said it gave her chills.

"It was really a miracle."

Even in the dead of winter, the Tennessee mountains display a beautiful array of colors and authenticate the splendor of orange and garnet.

Berlin Wall: Free at last, an American perspective

by Pam Gunter

It used to be that when you thought of Germany, you thought about Hitler and the Nazis, the death camps of WWII, things like "Sprechen sie Deutsch," among other things.

Now, while memories of WWII and such may linger, a new image of Germany asserts itself -- East meeting West, the crumbling of the Berlin Wall.

Most of us experienced the phenomenal change via satellite or by reading it in the newspaper.

But Jamie Gunter, manager of ISPS Development for IBM, had the opportunity to witness firsthand the unbelievably rapid, highly emotional change in Germany that saw the figurative and literal crumbling of the Berlin Wall.

"It's unbelievable." That is the statement most Germans make when speaking about the rapid changes," Gunter said. The excitement was everywhere. "People were having wall chipping parties, a band was playing, even the East German police who were patrolling the border were posing for pictures." Gunter attended one of the "wall chipping" parties in order to get a piece of the wall.

"...they wanted every one who came over to take a piece of [the wall] so they could get rid of it."

The leader of the 'party' she attended was apparently quite a showman. He was chipping away pieces and distributing them to the crowd (mostly German) that had gathered, keeping them laughing and smiling all the while.

The man was using a handheld tool, she said, and it took him a long time to make a little progress. The chips were small but well worth the wait. Gunter explained why this was so, "Another man there said that they [the German people] wanted everyone who came over to take a piece of it so they could get rid of it."

The world rejoiced at the sight of the reunited German people. The singing and dancing, champagne drinking, and slower exchanging was all a part of the emotional "frenzy." The press capitalized on this, yet they maintained some reserve.

"The Germans felt the [American] press was still a little wary of Gorbachev. They wanted us to know that he had actually initiated the change, that they didn't have to overcome Soviet oppression or worry about Soviet intervention," she added.

So without the threat of Soviet intervention, the Germans cele-

In this article, newly appointed Rumanian government officials expressed that they agree with Ceausescu's speedy execution even though the decision may have been a mistake in haste. Their views were justified by saying that 1) if Ceausescu were kept alive there would be more reasons for his Securitate to continue fighting and 2) seeing Ceausescu dead would give the Rumanians some peace to hopefully prevent them from "... wider vengeance against communism in general."

Using the act-utilitarian principle, it was decided that taking this one life would save many more innocent lives than would be lost if Ceausescu continued to rule. Therefore, Ceausescu's murder would actually provide the greatest balance of good over evil and hence should be carried out. Was this, however, the moral thing to do? What about a man's right to life? Even though he had thousands of people killed, was it right to kill him without a public trial? The principle of justice also comes into play in this situation. Should Ceausescu be treated as he treated those he put to death and be put to death as they were?

Some would take the stand that life is priceless. Even though Ceausescu murdered so many people, who has the right to decide that his life should be taken? Others might argue that Ceausescu should not have been murdered, at least without a public trial. If after a trial he was sentenced to death, his execution would have been justified.

At that point maybe he would have realized that what he did was evil instead of believing he had done no wrong. It possibly would have made a difference for some people to know that Ceausescu knew that he brought about his own death by committing such cruel acts on the people of Rumania. Would all this have mattered, though, to the majority of people who believed that he should have been executed with no questions asked. Definitely not.

This argument stems from an article entitled "Unfinished Revolution" in Time magazine, January 8, 1990, p. 33.

Scotty was feeling really bad. It was the middle of January, and another rejection notice was the only thing to be found in the mailbox. It was his last hope...five college applications and five rejections.

Scotty realized that the calamity was of his own design. His teachers had gone out of their way to help him maintain his mediocre grades, and his guidance counselor had even paid some of the application fees for him. He would have to go back to his guidance counselor Monday and ask for some more schools. But he had gone through all the "sure-thing" schools. If only he could find a college to whom grades and ACT scores were unimportant; he knew one must exist somewhere.

Monday morning came too soon for him; he hadn't even started his English paper. The upcoming math test had also gone unattended over the weekend. He had no time for high school (he never had); he must concentrate on getting into college. Scotty was always living in a fallacy.

He went to his guidance counselor with a great story that he had thought of in history - he always had time to prepare for upcoming events during class.

Counselors are of a sturdy stock; she met his failure with a stiff upper lip but was secretly questioning how anyone with a semi-functional nervous system could be rejected from his last choice.

She had not had to do what she knew she must in quite awhile, but she had received a nice gift from Scotty's mother for Christmas. She also knew that this poor child, whose ACT score was lower than the par at the eighteenth hole, had but one place to look now that the Diesel College of Hoboken had turned him down.

The particular drawer that she went to was marked with a hardly re-assuring sign: ABANDON HOPE ALL YE WHO ENTER.

Once Scotty had sounded out the words, even he turned a strange shade of pale.

The counselor threw the catalog down on her desk, trying her best not to look at the blonde-headed propaganda tool on the cover. Once Scotty got a look at the cover, he asked her if it was a catalog to Barbizon or some other modeling school.

"No," she said dryly, "you're scores on the ACT are a bit below the standards of Barbizon." She looked at him intensely and asked him once more if he was sure he wanted to go to college.

He shook his head fiercely; she could swear that she could hear rattling in there.

"Well, Scotty," she said, trying to think of something inventive to say. "This is a very special school. Frankly, I don't often recommend it to most of my students, but I think that it is well-suited to you," she said with a twinkle in her eye and satisfaction in her voice.

He began to thumb through the catalog. He liked all the pictures. On the last page, he found gratification. It said, "if you can't get in here, you can't get in anywhere." He knew that this was the school for him.

Ignorance blinds public opinion

There have been dramatic international issues of late. The falling of the iron curtain will have reverberations for decades to come, just as it did when it went up.

Arguments still rage over the Panama ordeal, some calling it an invasion, some calling it another leap toward world freedom.

Many cheered the execution of the Romanian leaders while others cried foul play in the absence of a fair trial.

It seems significant that these same protesters are not bothered by the fact that Manuel Noriega will neither be so privileged.

Which boils down to the basic point of crying wolf, who of any of these groups has the facts to support any position let alone a differing viewpoint?

An overheard conversation regarding the Panamanian conflict was amusing, if not pathetic. One party criticized the "arrogant bully USA" for "pushing around defenseless countries" while the opponent stressed the needed defense of Americans in Panama, regardless if "the drug trafficking animal had to be hunted down."

The retort came back as "why the hell are we in Panama anyway?" Why indeed?

And why did neither party realize that no one had enough facts to support such vehement opinions.

It seems evident these are mere emotional responses to far-reaching events that shape and reshape our whole concept of civilization.

The Soviet Union, the mean ole mother, is going to let her kids play with the rest of the neighborhood. In Romania, it is an eye for an eye. They kill, they are killed.

Noriega, he is the bad boy who got caught lying to both parents and has to be punished.

To reduce issues too simplistically (which is the general recourse in light of the lack of information) only serves to conjure up the most elementary rights and wrongs.

Therefore the real problem lies not in everyday opinion, but in the goings-on of the higher echelons, the top brass behind closed doors.

Technology has enabled massive communications between continents ergo global village. But being able to talk to one another does not necessarily assure the truth will be told.

It seems impossible to expect a remote glimpse of true circumstances even in our own backyard, particularly when blame rests on our shoulders. So how can an open door policy really exist?

The public certainly "has a right to know" but the pity remains in the stark reality that the public does not know, probably never will know.

But blind opinions abound anyway.

From Bismarck to Watergate to Iran-contra to Noriega, the facts are in the closely guarded hands of those in power.

The public can merely sit in the back seat whining and regaling the roads taken. But the drivers in politics will always determine the destination.

'Cold War is over,' professors struggle to alter lesson plans in wake of dramatic world events

(CPS) -- As The Wall in Berlin came tumbling down Nov. 9, so did the lesson plans of many history and political science professors around the country.

Scores of teachers say they're unable to use the books and materials that, at the beginning of the term, accurately reflected European politics, thought and culture.

All that has changed, of course, with the collapse of rigid Stalinist politics in Poland and Hungary and of old-line leaders in East Germany. Winds of change also are blowing through Czechoslovakia.

"It's not possible to teach a standard course. You've just got to scrap your notes and syllabus and start over," said Robert Wells, who teaches domestic and foreign policy at St. Lawrence University in New York.

Wells has made "weekly revisions" in his lectures this semester, forced to rely on notoriously unscholarly newspaper and magazine articles for scholarly information.

Michael Sodara, a political science professor at George Washington University in Washington, D.C., also has altered his lectures to discuss the latest events.

"I've spent more time on current events, and I am discussing East Germany during lectures when it is appropriate."

In Maryland, Towson State University's Armin Mruck, a naturalized American citizen who left Germany in 1951, has scrapped his lesson plans for three class periods so he could discuss East Germany.

"Students are very interested, even beyond my expectations," he said. "I think they realize that this is probably the most important event in this part of the century."

Responding to economic failures, leaders in the Soviet Union, Poland, Hungary, and East Germany have been adopting reforms, and seem to find that each reform demands another, more basic change.

Now the nations' politics seem to be changing, as the Soviet Union adopted a new legislative structure, Poland elected non-communist leaders and Hungary's Communist Party even changed its name.

On Nov. 9, the most dramatic symbol of the division of Europe -- the Berlin Wall -- "fell" as East Germany's government announced its citizens could travel freely and that it would soon hold popular elections.

The phenomenal freeing of huge numbers of people probably portends still more disorder and change in Europe as well as in the United States, where the 50-year-old notion of "free" and "communist" worlds locked in mortal combat that could lead to nuclear destruction had molded everything from foreign policy to religion to commerce.

"The Cold War is over," Towson's Mruck declared. "(Americans) have to readjust."

But not all professors are rushing to change what they are teaching.

"This doesn't change it at all. Political science is still in the business of studying current events. This is just another interesting thing to add," said Dean Meyers, a political science professor at Indiana State University.

"I would imagine that these changes, plus 1992 (when western European countries will implement an open market among themselves), are going to fundamentally change European Studies at Stanford University.

Schmitter said college courses would be fundamentally changed, too. "Courses will not be exclusively on Eastern Europe, but all of Europe. There isn't anything like that now."

St. Lawrence's Wells concurred. "It seems that any courses have to reflect the significant changes and include the role of the Soviet Union in allowing those changes."

Over time, scholars will have new topics to explore, such as comparing voters and legislation between the East and West governments, Sodara said.

Wells' lectures now reflect his belief the Cold War is "dying a slow death. I'm sure some people still believe the Soviet Union is antagonistic, but the events of the last three years don't show that," he said.

Even though relations between the superpowers aren't as chilly as they have been in the past, Indiana State's Meyers doesn't believe student enrollment in courses about the Eastern Bloc will increase in the long run.

"Americans lose interest very quickly. I suspect that when the news dies down, their interest will lag," he said.

But Towson student Dean Brohawn says his classmates are very interested in the reform movements and want to know more about these countries that had been the enemy when the semester began.

"I'm very lucky to be in [Mruck's] class," he said.

"This is one of the great epochs of our era," Wells said. "It makes teaching about the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe a lot more exciting."

Entrance scores fall in 1989 as expected

(CPS)-- The American College Testing (ACT) scores of this year's freshman dipped slightly in 1989, the group that administers the test said Sept. 12.

A few days before the ACT report, the College Board said average scores on the standardized test it sponsors -- the Scholastic Aptitude Test -- also had dropped.

Students taking the ACT in 1989 averaged 18.6, two-tenths of a point lower than the 1988 average of 18.8, which in turn was one-tenth of a point higher than the 1987 average.

The test is administered by American College Testing in Iowa City, Iowa. Between 1980 and 1989, the average scores have varied between 18.3 and 18.8. The highest score on ACT is 30.

"Although the average ACT scores have fluctuated a small amount from year to year, they are at about the same level today as 10 years ago, even though more students are taking the ACT assessment than ever before," said ACT President Richard Ferguson.

In 1989, 855,171 students took the test, 1 percent more than in 1988. The ACT is the predominant college admission test in 28 states.

Averages for minorities stayed the same or dropped slightly. In recent years, minority scores have been slightly increasing. Asian Americans were the only minorities who improved their scores in 1989.

Men scored higher than women in all areas except English, where women scored more than a point higher than men. ACT officials say that the gender gap has narrowed in the past decade because more women are taking core classes.

The 1989 SAT scores also dropped slightly, with average verbal scores at 427 -- one point lower than in 1988 -- while math scores stayed at 476. A perfect score is 800.

Forums focus on global village

by Jana Dalton

Global Village is the foundation topic for the Spring semester Community Forum.

Random House Dictionary defines global village as "the world, especially considered as the home of all nations and peoples living interdependently."

"And that's the issue," said Joan Worley, Community Forum Chairperson. "It is a catch phrase people are using in articles, in common use and we don't know what it means."

The phrase was coined in the sixties by social philosopher Marshall McLuhan who believed media and technology would alter our way of thinking and transcend national boundaries.

But with the increasing international awareness and recent explosive events, the success of such a concept is questionable.

"Would there have been a Romanian revolution if it weren't for television?" asked Worley.

"We faxed information to the Chinese students, so obviously there is an impact of technology."

The Forum itinerary features a wide scope of speakers who will examine the varying influences global village on our society.

The first meeting on Feb 8, is in the FAC at 11:00 am. The keynote speaker is Bill Rukeyser.

Latin America presents scorching version

HEADLINE: U.S. massacre in Panama
subhead: Brave resistance by the people to the invasion confirms prediction that U.S. would soon intervene in Latin America on the pretext of drug dealings.

U.S. TROOPS invaded Panama on the morning of December 20, culminating a spiral of aggression that has included economic blockade, psychological warfare and armed provocation.

General Manuel Antonio Noriega, head of the Panamanian Defense Forces (FDP) and head of government for the last few days, is directing the defense of the country from an undisclosed location in the capital, reported Major Edgardo Lopez Grimando, spokesman for the defense forces from the underground.

U.S. soldiers killed Panamanian soldiers guarding FDP headquarters and then opened up with artillery fire against the military installation with air and ground forces, according to a radio report.

Meanwhile, the United States jammed TV channel 2, then the U.S. coat of arms appeared, as a voice off the screen warned Panamanians not to fight the invaders and threatened reprisals, according to a Panamanian military spokesman.

Panamanian National Radio reported that the invaders had slaughtered civilians in the San Miguelito and Chorillo neighborhoods while TV broadcasts repeatedly urged Panamanians to defend the homeland.

Panamanian officials called for world solidarity to stop the U.S. forces, according to a state radio broadcast.

White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said that U.S. backed politicians Guillermo Endara and Ricardo Calderon Arias had been sworn in as president and vice president of Panama. Endara told a Costa Rican radio station that he supported the invasion of his country.

Fitzwater said that President Bush had ordered the attack to restore democracy, protect U.S. citizens in Panama and capture General Noriega, who is accused of involvement in the international drug traffic.

In the days prior to the invasion, the United States stepped up its threats and aggression, causing an incident in which Panamanian civilians and a U.S. soldier were killed.

The U.S. unilaterally designated Fernando Manfredo as Canal administrator for 1990 and leaked a report to the CBS-TV network that quoted Defense Department officials as saying the U.S. military had been given the green light to capture drug dealers in any part of the world and take them to the United States. This was viewed in some circles as a signal for invasion.

Fitzwater refused to say if the U.S. soldiers in Panama, whose number he did not specify, had orders to arrest Noriega alive.

As this issue went to press, there was heavy fighting in the Panamanian capital with considerable loss of life on both sides. The head of a local hospital said many residents in areas around FDP barracks had been killed by U.S. bombing and artillery shelling.

"This is hell and there are many dead gringos."

a witness told a Panamanian radio station, adding that Noriega's offices had been destroyed.

In New York it was reported that Nicaragua had requested an emergency meeting of the UN Security Council to discuss the U.S. invasion. The Sandanista government ordered national combat alert, in view of the possible consequences of the invasion.

With only ten days to go before the start of the last decade of the century, when the United States is supposed to turn the Canal over to the Panama, U.S. forces are slaughtering Panamanians. This confirms the prophecy made some years ago by the then president of Colombia, Lopez Michelsen: "We'll soon see the United States intervening in Latin America on the pretext of drug trafficking."

Rukeyser visits MC

by Jana Dalton

Bill Rukeyser's credentials are long and impressive, from Princeton, to Cambridge, from the Wall Street Journal to Fortune to Money, from Time to his present position of editor-in-chief, executive vice president of Whittle Communications. To say he is qualified to address the Community Forum is an understatement.

He remarked that "global village is a complicated concept, not obvious."

Rukeyser is a hard man to land for speaking engagements.

His reasons for gracing MC involve his affection for Tennessee.

"I know very well the region and what it's trying to accomplish. I thought it would help," he said.

Rukeyser is known as a dynamic speaker, and when asked for three words to describe himself, he responded after some thought, "anticipating Maryville curiously."

And we anticipate his contributions.

Dr. Kim is coordinator of the next REPORT FROM THE FIELD: KOREA.

It will feature the students who just returned from Korea last semester.

The meeting will be held at CCM on Thursday, Feb. 1st.

LADY SCOTS RANK SECOND IN NATION

Despite youth ladies win

by Pam Gunter

It's a goal that most basketball players and teams only dream of, almost a mythical beast that only 'fairy tale' teams can conquer. But the MC Lady Scots basketball team appears to have well in hand the sword to slay the beast.

Last week, the team broke into the top five in the nation in the NCAA Division III poll with a 12-2 record. Two more wins helped them jump to the number two position this week.

If they keep winning at this rate, it is possible that we could see a repeat trip to the NCAA tournament. (Last year's team hosted the South Region divisional playoffs.)

Donyelle Thompson is one of the keys to the Scots' success. The sophomore post averages 19.9 points per game, which ranks her 25th in the nation among Division III scorers.

Sophomore wing Sherri Daigle is not far behind her taller cohort. Being the ladies' second leading scorer and averaging 17 points per game, she is an imposing outside threat.

As a team, the Scots are shooting

47.1% from the field, a statistic that puts them 11th in the nation. Thompson's 52.9, Daigle's 49.6, and freshman Amy Ownby's 52.4 field goal percentages help account for this.

And the ladies have achieved all of this at a very tender age. One junior, three sophomores, and one freshman comprise the starting five.

However, three of these starters saw action in last year's divisional playoffs. Along with Thompson, junior point guard Valerie Matlock and sophomore Kathy Regan played in the regional tournament.

Matlock utilizes her surprising quickness and sound passing ability to direct the action on the court. Regan is a quiet but effective wing capable of hitting the outside shot.

Reserve Lisa Locke is important to the Scots' overall scheme of things. She can sub for Thompson, and the team loses little, especially in the area of hustle.

Despite their youth, the Lady Scots basketball team could be on its way to making MC history. A little more experience, a whole lot of hustle, and even more desire could make this season the things dreams are made of.

Donyelle Thompson leads the Lady Scots in scoring and in rebounding, averaging almost 20 points and 11 boards per game. Her scoring average ranks her 25th in the nation in Division III.

Moore lauds team

by Lori Chambers

The Maryville Lady Scots basketball team is seeing great success this season, with an overall record of 14-2 and being ranked number one in the South.

In his third year, head coach Wes Moore says that the success of this year's team is due to the aggressive style of the ladies' defense.

Valerie Matlock, a junior guard, makes a lot happen on the court. Moore described her as a hustler and an aggressive player. She "spreads the excitement," he said, "and when other players see her hustling then others tend to play the same."

Freshman Amy Ownby is another player that provides a spark for the team, averaging eight points per game. Moore said that she is one of the best defensive players on the team.

Another member of the team that provides a strong point is sophomore Donyelle Thompson. She ended last season very strong at the post position, and she entered this season just as concentrated, according to Moore. Thompson is a major factor for the Lady Scots, while averaging 19 points and nine rebounds per game.

One thing that concerned Moore at the beginning of the season was the number of players on the team. With a large number of players, a coach is concerned with attitudes. Moore described his team as being "unselfish."

Moore has two assistants this year. Rose Ballard, a 1989 graduate of Maryville College, is helping the post players. She is passing along her experience. Moore's other assistant, Dean Walsh, has good knowledge of the game. Walsh also works with the post players, but he mainly watches for what is working and what is not on the court and then helps make adjustments.

Moore's outlook for post-season play is hopeful. He said that they need to improve between now and then, but feels that once the team has put a whole game together and not just one good half, the team will be ready for post season play.

New Disney success: Little Mermaid

by Melissa Martines

The theatres are swamped with so-called "hit" movies; however, many of them are too childish or contain too many adult themes for the whole family to enjoy.

Walt Disney's latest release, "The Little Mermaid", is a movie for the whole family. It is entertaining "for kids one to 92."

The story of true love is told with traditional Disney animation, songs, and humor. A full array of comic sidekicks accompanies the two main characters, Ariel, the mermaid, and Prince Erik, the human she loves.

Most memorable of these sidekicks is Sebastian, the crab, given voice by Samuel E. Wright (the grape in those old Fruit-of-the-Loom commercials). He reluctantly accepts the job of keeping tabs on Ariel for her father.

Sebastian provides a lot of hilarious scenes as he is torn between his fuddy-duddy attitude and his own spirit of adventure.

He is also the under-the-sea court's music composer and displays a very unfuddy-duddy love of reggae in his performances of "Under the Sea" and "Kiss the Girl."

The film is a revival of Disney style as in the classics "Cinderella" and "Sleeping Beauty" and is loosely based on the Hans Christian Andersen story by the same title.

"The Little Mermaid" has become a box office hit, and, judging by the jam-packed theatre, it will be a "hit" for all ages. Children and kids-at-heart shouldn't miss it.

brated heartily. Amidst the celebrating, however, the security remained tight. Border guards were obviously on patrol.

In fact, the Brandenburg Gate still had not been opened while Gunter was there. People were allowed to look over the wall, standing on ladders, but they weren't allowed through the gate yet, Gunter explained.

On the day Gunter decided to venture over to the East side "to say I went and to go and stare," she explained, the border guards seemed "in a bad mood."

"There was a marked difference between the East and West in everything. The stores outside the train stations in the West were so packed, and no one was buying in the East."

Part of the reason for this could have been the difference between the stores themselves. She described the stores in the West as being like the stores in any large city in America.

In East Berlin, however, "there were no neon signs. The stores were mostly empty space; all of the merchandise was kept behind counters so you had to ask to look at it."

And the stores were just the tip of the iceberg. The attitudes of the people, the way they dressed, the physical appearance of the cities, and much more differed greatly between the two sides.

"Many of the West Germans wanted to go to the wall but didn't want to go into the East," Gunter said, "but the station was packed with East Germans trying to go to the West."

She also noticed the people of East Berlin were wearing clothes of obviously inferior quality than those of the West.

The economic contrast between the cities was most shocking. The starkness was evident in the single fact that "the East was still rebuilding from the bombing of WWII," said Gunter.

An elite group imprisoned half of a nation.

Now, the world looks on as the people are reunited one chip at a time.

Student directed, student produced, student participation in all aspects. That was the premise behind the Theatre Interim.

Sophomore Kipp Martines the creator of the original idea, said, "I wanted to set up a more diversified theatre setting- not a one-man director - producer - everything show. I wanted everyone more involved this time."

Martines, who was unable to participate for personal reasons, hopes that this play will be the precedent for other Interim productions.

Andi Bristol, a senior at MC, is the director of the play. After setting up a directing practicum, Bristol has taken charge.

The actual play, Shakespeare's Twelfth Night, was chosen by Bristol over the summer. "I thought it was time we did some Shakespeare at MC," said Bristol. "I also needed a flexible cast because I didn't know how many people I'd have to work with."

Twelfth Night is a comedy involving a love triangle complicated by a woman masquerading as a man.

"I love the show," said Bristol. "I thought it was very approachable for student actors and an inexperienced director - it's fun," she added.

Although Bristol is satisfied with the progress of Twelfth Night and its cast, not all the students involved are happy with the way the Interim has turned out.

"Some things did not work out as originally planned," said Martines.

John Worth, a sophomore acting in the play and as technical director, said, "I wasn't happy about lack of student participation in making the decisions about which play was done and the performance dates."

The play goes up the first weekend in February, eleven days after Interim has ended for everyone else. "No one was informed of that at sign-up," said Worth.

Performances are at 8:15 p.m. February 1, 2, and 3. Adult tickets are $4, student tickets are $2, and MC students get in free.

The world has never had a good definition of the word liberty, and the American people, just now, are much in want of one. We all declare for liberty; but in using the same word we do not all mean the same thing. With some the word liberty may mean for each man to do as he pleases with himself, and the product of his labor; while with others the same word may mean for some men to do as they please with other men, and the product of other men's labor. Here are two, not only different, but incompatible things, called by the same name - liberty. things is, by the respective parties, called by two different and incompatible names - liberty and tyranny.

MC student death shocks campus

by Heather Miller

Susan Eleanor Owens, a nursing major at M.C., was killed in an automobile accident at 10:30 p.m. on Sunday, February 4.

She was coming home from a church service in Tellico on U.S. 411 South in Madisonville. The car she was driving collided with a 1981 Cadillac.

The Tennessee Highway Patrol believed she had either fallen asleep or had been reaching for something in the car which caused the car to veer into the south-bound lane.

The campus has been shocked by the loss.

Carol Callaway recalled a funny moment that happened on the Saturday preceding her death. While hiking off the beaten trail in tennis shoes, she said "I'm going to fall before the day is over." After successfully climbing up and down a hill, she tripped on a root and fell. She recovered and led the group, going off trail by accident, and fell again. She laughed each time.

Callaway said, "Susan always had something nice to say about everybody. You rarely saw her without a smile. [She had] an optimistic, positive outlook on life."

She added, "All she ever wanted to do was help people."

Forum features Liberty president

by Jennifer Raper

Through the Community Forum meetings on the Global Village, Maryville College is presenting a variety of highly commendable speakers, including Dr. William Kingsley, a diverse and influential individual.

Dr. Kingsley, professor and president of William Jewell College in Liberty, Missouri, which is ranked as one of "America's Best Colleges," is quite a distinct person. Aside from his responsibilities at Liberty, Dr. Kingsley is an author of two books, in addition to some ninety articles and reviews.

Despite his many duties, he still has time to savor his favorite activities of reading, theatre, sports, and running marathons.

Organizer of William Jewell's overseas programs with Oxford and Cambridge Universities, Dr. Kingsley enjoys traveling abroad periodically and is an internationally acclaimed speaker.

Focusing upon improving the individual self and creating the best community both locally and globally, his presentations are identified by his style of candor, realism, and occasional "rather wretched" humor.

Dr. Kingsley holds numerous degrees and honors from various universities. Among them are Mississippi College (B.A., 1955), University of Missouri (M.A., 1956), and New Orleans Baptist Theological Seminary (B.D., 1960; Th.D., 1965). In addition, Dr. Kingsley has completed post-doctoral work at the University of Louisville and at Cambridge University in England. Honorary doctorates have been awarded to him by Mercer University and Seinan Gakuin University in Japan.

Also, Dr. Kingsley has studied at Northwestern University, the National University of Ireland-Galway, and Harvard University on summer grants.

Dr. Kingsley will be making his presentation "Pilgrimage in the Global Village" on February 22 at 11 a.m. in the Fine Arts Center.

A feast to behold, dinner planned

by Jeff Huffman

The International Club will present an International Dinner on February 24.

There will be an incredible variety of foods. Included on this multicultural menu:

- Japanese Potato-Meatball
- Korean Vegetable Dish
- Italian Pasta Dish
- Italian Wedding Soup
- Mexican Enchiladas
- Chinese Chicken Stew

In addition, there will be foods of Indian, Greek, Thai, and Arabic origin.

Along with this wide mixture of international tastes, there will be entertainment of worldwide dimensions. A traditional Japanese dance will be performed by several Japanese students of MC. Also planned is a karate demonstration, and an Arabic exhibition.

Grayce Finley, secretary of the International Club, says "It will be wonderful, just wonderful."

The dinner will be in the Margaret-Ware Dining Hall at 7pm. The dinner has a pricetag of $5.00 for students, $7.00 for anyone else. For a change of cultural linguistics, this dinner would be excellent. The dinner will represent a very colorful expression of today's everchanging world. For once, the "global village" will have its own party.

Love and romance was the theme of this year's February Fantasy as students donned far-out attire.

Seniors angered by 100 daze

One Hundred Days. The prestigious signaling of the final 100 days until graduation has become a senior ritual. It really is a grand affair. The president and his wife, joined by the department chairpersons, cabinet officers, and alumni relations director, offer champagne toasts to the near graduates.

But this year the one hundred days, or was that 100 Daze, seemed plagued with problems. There was a significant amount of criticism leveled at the occasion and its planning.

The senior invitation list springs from the registrar's office which verifies those people who have met their requirements and are classified as seniors. This in turn is given to Student Development, where the invitations are addressed and sent.

The senior list should include students who are graduating in Spring and December and continuing education students. The other guests are invited by the president.

The first problem this year was the overlooking of several qualified seniors. Many who will graduate in Spring and December, as well as several CE students, seemed to have been lost in the turnovers.

This did not answer, however, the question of how a person who no longer attends MC was present, since attendance was by invitation only, nor why this person was allowed to remain. In addition, a person not graduating until May of 1991 was included in the festivities.

Another shaky area involved the faculty. Maryville can be like a family to some students; occasionally parents are now represented by unique and talented professors. But despite blood relations, it seems only natural for seniors to desire the company of those individuals who have assisted in their reaching this peak in life. Department chairpersons and cabinet members can hardly substitute for those special professors. And it seems only logical that there is, in most cases, an enormous gap of misunderstanding between the president and the students; the faculty are the only ones who can bridge this gap.

Therefore it seems evident that this year's celebration was riddled with inconsistencies. Unfortunately, the seniors are the only persons to suffer from rushed or incomplete planning. Regardless of the good intentions, it is a pity that only a portion of the senior class and few faculty revelled in this moment. Perhaps another gathering can be scheduled which will accommodate the seniors in full, and this year will serve as a reminder of what not to do next year.

Not long ago, a report was published by the National Endowment for the Humanities (NEH) entitled "50 Hours." I feel that this report is of particular interest to MC, a small liberal-arts college. The report was about the necessity of a core which would acquaint the entire student body with such areas as literature, international history and customs, economics, and philosophy.

At first, I thought that MC, for once, was comparable to other fabled small colleges, such as Swathmore, DePauw, Davidson, or Amherst. But then I examined a core course that I have been exposed to, and I realized that improvements could be made for the benefit of the students and the faculty.

TC Talks: Is fine arts a fiasco?

Fine Arts is a class of many antitheses. It is a required course with the goal of giving the student knowledge of aesthetics, architecture, music, and theater. An enviable task in any amount of time; however, it only has a single semester to familiarize the student to four fields which not only are different but which also have had scholars spend lifetimes on their explorations.

Fine Arts is allegedly a "crip" course to the incoming student, but ask anyone presently in the class, and you will find that, mostly, the only crippling thing about the class is the effect on a G.P.A.

But who is to blame for this injustice? Certainly not the faculty of the department. They are asked to compile their life's studies into the span of a few weeks.

How unfair it seems that they just do not have ample time to pass on to the student something more than mere memorization. They have not the time to instill a true wonder of their fields; indeed, because of the short amount of time, the students actually begin to resent the field because of the sheer demand of learning the rudiments of a vastly comprehensive area in no longer than a few weeks. No one can truly learn the expected principles in the course; one can only retain it until the test on that section is taken, then it quickly fades from the short-term memory, the memory which the course itself dictates the student employ.

Most certainly, the students are not at fault either. Most would rather spend the semester studying one area of the fine arts instead of being exposed to many different areas which are remembered in passing as areas which quite honestly demanded too much time and offered no reward except another area to tackle.

The problem has a solution, if

Senior shames student body

Dear Editor,

Permit me to qualify this letter by making it known that I am fully aware that Maryville College has never been, and will never be, a utopia. I will gladly admit that I have no monopoly on the truth. Perhaps I am but a foolish senior whose time has come and gone.

Nevertheless, I have found the high level of student apathy and low level of student involvement in campus-wide social events to be particularly disheartening. Where are the students? I invite 30 people to come to a meeting, and nine actually attend. I work at Casino Night, and the crowd is about one-fifth of previous Casino Night crowds.

Please keep in mind that I have worked with Student Programming and Student Senate in the past, and we could never claim perfection. We blamed the apathy on the transitional nature of the College. We hired a new president and a new vice president for Student Development. Those of us who really cared about the institution were fairly confident that once we had stability in some of these key positions, the rest would fall into place. Maybe we were living in a fantasy world.

But perhaps we overestimated the students' ability to appreciate and follow the College's leadership. And if students are unhappy with the direction that they think that the College is heading in, they do not aid their "plight" by sitting on their duffs and refusing to get involved and speak up.

I reach to help the students of Maryville College but get no pulse. Where are the signs of life? On the positive side, I perceive that our athletic, religious, and fine arts activities continue to grow and thrive. I am positive that there are other areas.

But I have no feeling that we are building much of a sense of community. You can call me old fashioned, but I still think that it is vital for this institution to meet, socialize, and grow as one. And that might mean that people will have to give up that trip to Cumberland Avenue. Students might even have to get out of their dormitory rooms every once and a while. Even our commuters could give on-campus social activities a try. It could be a horribly wonderful experience.

I invite each and every one of you to give our college a chance. And if you are not satisfied with something, speak up. Please give those meetings a chance. Let Student Programming know what you want. You pay for a lot of the social events on campus through your annual donation to the Student Activity Fee. Do not waste your (or your parents') hard-earned money.

If I have offended anybody, that is fine, for it shows me that there is some life out there. My fear is that students will read this and not give a hoot. My greatest fear is that this apathy is inherent to a generation that has grown up on MTV, Nintendo, and Ronald Reagan. Indulge me. Please get angry.

In conclusion, I beg each and every one of you to prove me wrong. It is possible that I am now out of touch. I certainly hope that that is not the case. Now is the time to act. If you do not take the initiative, you will not be able to have the excellent Maryville College experience that I have had. That thought is truly disheartening.

MC refuses to 'officially' acknowledge student death

Dear Editor,

On February 4, Susan Owens, a student here at Maryville College died in an auto accident. Like many, I did not know Miss Owens. My distress lies in that the only way that I found out about her death was through campus hearsay.

I realize that this student was not very social, and from what I understand, this was of her own volition. My problem lies in that to this point, nothing official has been stated to the students concerning her death. I was further distressed when I went to discuss the issue with friends, only to find out that they had not heard of her death.

I realize that the issue of death can be a very volatile situation, and I am not saying that anything should have been done in bad taste - but something should have been done! Students should have been sensitively notified about her death. Students also should have been told that a prayer would be said for Susan Owens at the Tuesday Morning Worship, thus allowing all students on campus, not just those who attend the service, to say their prayers.

I am not saying that the life of Susan Owens should have been colored, not am I saying that this event should have been made into a circus; however, on a small campus where each student is suppose to be an individual, an official recognition of this loss should have occurred. Perhaps it is easier to avoid the issue of death but she was a human being, and she deserved to have her death handled in a more dignified way than through word of mouth. I sincerely hope that in the upcoming issue of the Highland Echo a long overdue statement is written on the sad fate of Susan Owens.

Sincerely,
Murray F. Kosmin

Or so the American Civil liberties Union of today should be more appropriately titled. The ACLU has once again exhibited its insatiable lust for defending esoteric causes by recently losing a lawsuit it filed on behalf of the Ku Klux Klan that challenged the constitutionality of a Pulaski, Tn. town ordinance, claiming the ordinance was a violation of the Klan's guarantees of free speech and assembly under the First Amendment. The Klan's deflated hopes centered on marching through the heart of Pulaski on January 13 (two days before the observation of the Martin Luther King Jr. holiday) in protest of the celebration. However, the Klan's plans were thwarted as U.S. District Judge John T. Nixon upheld the ordinance allowing only a single group (one which had applied for its permit long before the Klan) to parade each day. This, in turn, allowed the small town to keep order.

Members and advocates of the ACLU insist that they defend "the most unpopular causes based on constitutional grounds." That they are attempting to "preserve basic civil liberties guaranteed in the Bill of Rights."

Indeed, from its inception in 1920, the ACLU did make genuine contributions to the defense of civil liberties and civil rights in years past, but the current ACLU has strayed very far from its old agenda of civil liberties and civil rights to a "new agenda" of extremist causes. This agenda is fundamentally hostile to the processes of American constitutional democracy.

ACLU: the alliance of the contemptible, and the unscrupulous

Originally, the ACLU was founded to challenge the deportation of aliens ordered out of the country by then Attorney General A. Mitchell Palmer; to win the rights of workers to organize; and to defend the right of a public school teacher to discuss the theory of evolution with his students. The union secured a ruling which allowed James Joyce's Ulysses to enter the country, changing the court's views on obscenity. It also helped take the Korematsu case, which protested the internment of Japanese-Americans during World War Two, to the Supreme Court. And in 1954 the ACLU helped win the historic desegregation decision in Brown vs. Board of Education.

These cases exemplify the "old agenda" of the ACLU which addressed the rights of free speech, free exercise of religion, free press, freedom of assembly, and freedom from official acts of racism. In vindicating these rights, the ACLU improved the operation of our constitutional democracy by providing, in its own words, "the missing ingredient that made our constitutional system finally work." Civil liberties and civil rights were not defended "for their own sake," but rather for their instrumental value in promoting democracy in America. That agenda had a bonafide worth to American society.

However, the "new agenda" domineering the present day

ACLU is overflowing with an abundance of immoral profligacy and spurious conviction, at best. According to the ACLU, airport security checkpoints violate the individuals right against unreasonable searches under the Fourth Amendment. The ACLU urges repeal of all drug laws and all laws against prostitution, and has objected to laws allowing the post office to stop delivering obscene materials upon customer request. Furthermore, the ACLU has lobbied endlessly for laws which would prevent all forms of censorship, especially child pornography. The ACLU has gone out of its way to represent draft card burners, neo-Nazis in Skokie, Illinois, the Klan, anti-abortion demonstrators, and gay rights demonstrators. Finally, the falsehood that the ACLU is some sort of "watchdog" over the Bill of Rights is entirely erroneous. Its interpretation of the Constitution is selective, and shaped by political incentives. The ACLU interprets freedom of the press to mean that the sale of porn movies involving kids, even babies, is constitutionally protected under the First Amendment. This is known as "expanding our First Amendment freedoms." However, is the ACLU active in expanding our Second Amendment freedoms too? No chance! The ACLU virulently supports gun control legislation!

In defense of its current agenda, the ACLU argues that they were hated in the past, but their actions back then are applauded today. They are hated today, therefore, their actions of today will be applauded tomorrow. That line of reasoning wins the Joe M. Blockhead award for the most shallow rationale of 1989.

Moreover, the ACLU takes positions that are hostile to the processes of constitutional democracy. First, the ACLU is attempting to override democratic processes by replacing them with judicial decrees. The ACLU is repeatedly attempting to force traditional legislative questions into the judicial arena, the least democratic branch of government. The union shows an obvious preference for government by appointed judges rather than by elected representatives.

Second, the ACLU's "new agenda" advances the aspirations of individuals without serious regard for legitimate countervailing interests of society as a whole. Unlike the ACLU's old agenda, involving no conflict between enhanced individual rights and authentic public interests, the ACLU's new agenda poses a serious threat to the democratic thread weaving the social fabric of America.

What are the reasons for this dramatic shift from the once respectable ACLU into the current sorrowful atrophy masquerading as "the defender of American civil rights?" One prominent New York writer coined it as being the "March of Dimes effect," the charity founded to help find a cure for polio. Once the cure was found, the organization redirected itself toward the elimination of birth defects. That seems to be an accurate summation of the ACLU. In part, the ACLU is a victim of its own success: once it had established America's "main channels of political liberty," and accomplished its main objectives, it didn't disband but defined new goals instead; goals unrelated to its old ones. Whether the ACLU is suffering from the "March of Dimes effect" or not, it may just find itself throeing from the consequences of the "Dodo effect" if it doesn't draft a new system of guidelines.

12th Night preludes coming show

by John Worth

Spring at Maryville College yields activity for all:

In the center of the artistic season lies the theatre program, gearing up for a momentous follow-up to the interim hit Twelfth Night. The actors auditioned February 5th, 6th, and 7th. Thursday, Feb. 8th the actors discovered if their butterfly filled stomachs were all for naught. Every year and every play the process is repeated. Yet this year is different.

For starters there is the play itself, titled Rimers of Eldrich. It is a dark drama centered on the small midwestern town of Eldrich, a burned out mining town of about 65 people. The catalyst for the story is the rape of a crippled girl, yet many other elements exist.

For example, there is a lady who abuses her mother; a boy haunted by his older brother's death; an old miner driven to insanity by failed love; and the presence of a drifter, who conveniently lives in sin with a female restaurant owner, thus sparking the interest of the local church.

The text is complex and the tone is dark and mysterious.

A large number turned out to audition with many new and interesting faces.

That leads to the next point of differentiation: the actors. The same old gang showed up, but the number of new faces that showed up was amazing. Truly amazing was the acting talent possessed by these new faces. Some who have been around felt threatened by their presence; others did not.

But all knew that something had happened to conjure up the talented bunch, most of whom were freshmen. Having Karen Gygli-the director-as a teacher encouraged some; others just wanted to. But a few auditioned because of a third factor: Twelfth Night.

The play yielded talent from actors placed in it for lack of a better interim. One guy witnessed the thrill of being backstage and felt compelled to be a part of it. Some heard of the excitement and some just enjoyed the play.

Either way it had a big impact on the theatre in that aspect, as well as on other: the audience enjoyed Twelfth Night.

The opening night crowd was rowdy and fun and the play went well; the second night was not as good as the first, but the crowd still responded well; the third and last night was a technically sound show although the audience was calmer and more quiet than the other nights.

The play sparked a fire in the community, which gave a sign that the Maryville College theatre program is on the upswing and once again producing quality plays.

So while spring fills the air, the theatrical artists will be working hard, too, sweating and becoming fatigued and going home with aching feet and legs, some saying "I'll never do this again" knowing that when audition time comes again they will be in the theatre excited and nervous and losing sleep again.

It is all part of the liberal arts experience, and quite an enjoyable one, even though it is sheer Hell.

Cruise sheds 'cool' for "Fourth of July"

by Pam Gunter

An Oliver Stone film about Viet Nam. Tom Berenger and Willem Dafoe have roles in the movie. Add Charlie Sheen and you have Platoon. Change Charlie Sheen to Tom Cruise and you have Born on the Fourth of July, a movie that is as different from Platoon as any movie could be. But together, the two movies are like the two sides of a coin - two distinct entities that are a part of a whole.

Born on the Fourth of July brilliantly portrays the struggle of returning Viet Nam veterans to gain the respect that they deserved from an ungrateful country and examines their struggle to regain their own self-respect that they had lost fighting the war.

With this movie, Tom Cruise finally proves he is an actor to be reckoned with. He discards his macho, "Top Gun" image to give a performance worthy of an Oscar.

Cruise plays Ron Kovic, real-life vet and author of the book which inspired the movie. As a young boy during the Kennedy administration, Kovic was led to believe (along with most of America) that the Communists were ready to take over the world.

When the U.S.' participation in the Viet Nam conflict escalated into war, the patriotic, naive Kovic joined the Marine Corp. but his family didn't like the idea, deeply in the military; his father and grandfather had served their country. Now it was his turn. Kovic said he was willing to die for his country, so he went to Viet Nam. Only he didn't die there, his fate was worse. He came home.

And he came home in a wheelchair. He returned not a hero who had bravely fought for his country but returned to protesters who knew nothing of the atrocities he had witnessed, to people who couldn't begin to understand him.

During his second tour he was wounded. But his wounds ran deeper than the bullet that had severed his spine.

And that is what this movie is about. His country had betrayed him; his government had misled his family.

Cruise's vivid portrayal of the paralyzed Kovic is a beauty to behold, and the atmosphere that permeates the entire movie, especially at the VA hospital, in Mexico, and in the anti-war rallies, reminds us (and teaches those of us too young to remember) of the brutal realities of the Viet Nam era.

Molly Ringwald, here, graduates from teen heroine to an actress of alluring maturity. But she and the rest of the cast are let down by this drab comedy based on Graham Greene's "Loser Takes All." Molly is newly married to an accountant (Robert Lindsay). They embark on a ritzy honeymoon in Monaco which they can't afford. There's no chemical reaction between the leads and the film meanders aimlessly. Greene's original title is more appropriate.

...moody comedy from Australia can be difficult at times, but it is original and audacious nevertheless. The story involves two sisters of contrasting temperament: the skittish Kay (Karen Colston) is superstitious and repressed while the sibling of the title (Genevieve Lemon) is outrageous and freewheeling. Director Jane Campion displays remarkable flare in presenting the startling aspects of these complex personalities.

as necessary. Spread sour cream evenly over tortillas. Top with remaining meat mixture.* Bake at 350°F. about 30 minutes or until hot and bubbly. Remove from oven; sprinkle with cheeses. Let stand 10 minutes; garnish with lettuce, if desired, and olives. Serve with additional picante sauce. Makes 8 servings.

*NOTE: At this point, casserole may be refrigerated up to 6 hours. Let stand at room temperature 30 minutes before baking.

Microwave oven directions: Prepare casserole as recipe directs in 13 x 9 x 2-inch baking dish or shallow 3-quart casserole. Cook uncovered at HIGH 20 minutes or until hot and bubbly, rotating dish once after 10 minutes. Sprinkle with cheeses; cover with wax paper and let stand 10 minutes. Serve as recipe directs.

Valentine's Day is probably the dumbest special occasion ever to be put on the calendar. I don't understand why every February people suddenly get all mushy and feel the urge to shower others with sentimental pleasantries.

Look at the day itself. February 14, is the feast day of a martyr. Do you suppose this foolishness all started when someone said, "Today is the anniversary of someone that was murdered. I think I will go buy a loved one some flowers." Yeah, I see the connection.

Some scholars believe the date is related to the beginning of the bird mating season. Very romantic.

We don't really know how the tradition started, but ever since we learned our A, B, C's in grade school, we turn soft on Valentine's Day and feel the need to vow our love to someone.

Raitt returns in 'Nick of Time'

by Travis Crabtree

After listening to Bonnie Raitt's new album, Nick of Time, the question arises, "Can this woman make a bad song?" The answer for this album as well as for the rest of Raitt's career is a solid and simple "NO".

The album ends a long absence for Raitt on the musical charts.

Don Was, who earlier this year refueled the career of the B-52's and the scorched the dance charts with his own group Was (Not Was), helped produced the album.

The album starts out with one of the strongest songs of the year, "Nick of Time", a mellow, foot-tapping, cerebral journey into the aging of a generation. It was primarily for this song and the song's message, accepting the changes of age, that Raitt returned to the studio.

Once back in the studio, Was heartfelt? I think not.

Why do these same Garanimals clad demons get into the spirit? Sure, they get a of couple frosted, heart shaped cookies, but they don't get to miss any school. At the end of the day, they come home with red stained tongues and a stack of valentines that they will spend the next two weeks trying to decipher whose illegible signature is at the bottom.

As they get older, these kids like to do something special for that certain someone. This usually comes in the form of flowers and a dinner out on the town. Isn't that what couples do on anniversaries? When an anniversary carries as much importance as the celebration of a martyr that may not have even existed or the beginning of the bird mating season there is a strong possibility that it soon may be over.

We need to put less emphasis on Valentine's Day so that our young will not be as preoccupied with it as ourselves. Possibly by associating it with something less attractive. Maybe not. In any case, joyous V.D.

took charge and helped Raitt not only solidify her roots in the blues, but also break new ground with the reggae tune "Have a Heart" and the cool funk of "Thing Called Love" and "Real Man".

The album also contains a variety of ballads such as "To Soon To Tell" (which the Neville Brothers could not have done better) and "Cry On My Shoulder", a very Patsy Cline type heart wrencher.

The other songs on the album, "Love Letter", "I Will Not Be Denied", and "The Road's My Middle Name" show that behind that sweet, soulful voice is a blues-influenced guitarist second to none in her generation.

Nick of Time has not only reaffirmed Bonnie Raitt as a true legend, but the album has also given the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame more to talk about during her induction ceremony.

Voices of homeless heal more than one

by Kathleen McArthur

Every day Americans are faced with the growing and inevitably destructive problem...homelessness.

This lifestyle has no prejudices, it accepts people of all ages, sexes, races, and religions. One might even go as far as to say that it is an area for equal opportunity, equally life threatening and confining. Beneath this heavy burden, however, lies some hope. New York City is helping to fight this disease with its' recently-established Street News.

This publication, described as "America's Motivational Non-Profit Newspaper" was put to press in the fall of 1989, and has changed the lives of homeless people in the city.

The paper is published monthly by Street Aid, an established group of advisors, donors, and staff members. Money comes from all types of people, James Taylor, Grace Jones, Paul Shaffer, and Bill Blass to name a few. The staff pools funds from donations and advertisements throughout the month, and produces a paper that is distributed by the homeless.

Each issue sells for 75 cents, and 50 cents remains with the salesperson. As a result, in the last two months, nine of 120 salespeople are no longer homeless. At this rate, the present national problem may one day become more of a memory than a plague.

The paper consists of material written by business men, politicians, athletes, journalists, and other public figures.

Articles range from inspirational notes to straight news to poetry by homeless people.

In addition, each page bears advertisements from various businesses throughout New York.

Street News not only allows people to have food and shelter, but it offers them a chance to express their feelings in written form. It helps to open the eyes of those who would just usually walk by someone in need without thinking twice.

Street Aid draws support from the public by offering "Street Aid Cards" to give to homeless people who may not be aware of this opportunity to make a better life for themselves. Students can become involved with a $10 per year subscription fee. The editors also eagerly accept letters for publication from anyone interested in expressing their views.

Donations are also appreciated, $500 (associate), $100 (friend), $50 (supporter with a t-shirt), $25 (supporter).

All donors receive a subscription for one year. To help, send a check or credit card information with name, address, college, and phone number to Street Aid.

Earthday draws near, MC prepares

by Jeff Huffman

Earth Day 1990, an event which will make the world environmentally aware and to celebrate the twentieth anniversary of the first Earth Day, is gaining more attention and garnering support for Sunday, April 22.

Maryville College will be part of what will be the largest celebration that has ever taken place. In order to give an idea of the world contingent: The Tennessee Conservation League, along with the assistance of the Tennessee Forest Association, will provide 4 1/2 million Tulip Poplar Saplings to every citizen of the state of Tennessee for planting.

.47 states are already gearing up for the big event with festivals, recycling campaigns, and special programs. . . foreign countries such as Italy, Canada, Poland, and Kenya are preparing for the event with cleaning campaigns, teaching of ways to care for the environment, and testing of land for pollution levels.

Plans for Maryville College's celebration are beginning to take form. The Environmental Task Force has already begun a can-cycle campaign that is still in progress. On the weekend of April 20 - 22, the Task Force will have a dance to commemorate the occasion. There will be several noted speakers who will give a bearing on the meaning of Earth Day 1990. Several special events, still in the planning stages, will also be offered.

A bevy of meetings on environmental change leading up to a large meeting that shall summarize all of the former discussions from the previous meetings. These gatherings not only include the campus, but the community as well, for everyone should be involved.

Bruce Guillaume, Earth Day 1990 project coordinator for MC, said "My goal is to be able to make responsible decisions about the environment." He wants it to be the goal of everyone who will participate in this global event. This isn't just a Maryville College Student function, it's a gathering of humanity to give the planet a birthday. The gifts we will give will be immeasurable.

only the administration, would pay heed to the well-being of the students' education and not plan a class solely for its merit in a catalog or brochure.

Presently, the administration can claim to offer a course covering the entire spectrum of fine arts. They also can boast of the excellent core program at MC which satisfies alumni and parents, many times too uninterested to check out the administration's claims for themselves.

As it is now, the Fine Arts core class, through no fault of the faculty or the students, is one which tries to shed light on too many subjects, only to leave them in a dull, gray phosphorescence in the students mind.

The answer, of course, is to focus on only one area (architecture, music, or theater) which would allow students the possibility of studying the area which interests them most. Focusing on one subject would also allow for more retention of the material, which in the long run is more beneficial to the student. The full knowledge of the professor could also be presented; no longer would the abilities and gifts of the faculty be hampered because of adherence to a calendar.

I feel it is vital that the Fine Arts class evolve into a true core class, one that educates the student in a manner that will be remembered and will be beneficial in the years to follow, and not simply a complacent and demanding vehicle of the core requirement.

Men's basketball team looking for that magic touch

by Pam Gunter

Babatu Willingham, head and shoulders above the rest, lays in two points in route to Scots' victory.

WOMEN'S BASKETBALL UPDATE

In our last issue, we reported that the Lady Scot's basketball team was ranked number two in the nation in the NCAA Division III poll. A few days later, on Jan. 28 the ladies suffered a frustrating loss to Centre College in Danville, KY. The loss cost them 15 positions in the national poll, putting them in the number 17 spot. Since the Centre loss, the team has won five straight games and have gradually worked their way back up the poll. Last week they captured the ninth spot, and with a couple of convincing wins since, they have made it to the eighth position in this week's poll.

Receiving an NCAA post-season tournament bid is hard enough, but being an independent school and getting one is virtually impossible. But the men's basketball team hopes to be the belle - er, ah, beau - of the NCAA ball.

Sporting an overall record of 14-4 and carrying a nine game winning streak into the weekend of February 10-11, the Scots appeared not to need a fairy godmother.

The fifth position in the South Region poll could have been their pumpkin. A few more wins could have transformed the pumpkin into a carriage to take them to the ball. But the clock may have struck 12 a little prematurely for the eager Scots.

On Friday, February 10, the team left Maryville to start an important road trip, scheduled to play Oglethorpe University that night and Stillman College in Tuscaloosa, Alabama on Saturday.

Oglethorpe delivered a disheartening blow to the Scots' hopes with a 75-50 victory. The 25 point margin may very well have started the Scots' clock to chiming.

On Saturday, things didn't get any better. Stillman handed Maryville its second straight double-digit loss, winning 85-62.

Now, with a record of 14-6, the Scots may be looking for a fairy godmother to wave her magic wand a few times.

COLLEGE PRESS SERVICE

It's tough being gay in a straight world, and sometimes there is no one to talk to about the important issues in life. Most people, many gays included, do not want to deal with issues that touch the lives of gay people. The time has come to make a place for the gay community on Maryville College campus. If you are gay and lonely; if you need someone to talk to or just socialize with, some of us do care.

The Center for Campus Ministry is willing to sponsor a gay student support group with the sole intention of offering the gay population of Maryville College an open, caring place of refuge from the isolation of life in this heterosexual society. The support group will be established for gay students and by gay students, and will take full advantage of the resources of the College in fostering a positive environment for those who are interested. The group will not be a Homosexuals Anonymous nor will it focus on changing the individual's orientation.

If you are gay and would be interested in participating in such a group, please contact Mark Koerber through Maryville College Box #2795. Rest assured that absolute confidentiality will be strictly maintained.

"Issues in Homosexuality" symposium in Lloyd Lobby

The Center for Campus Ministry will sponsor a symposium entitled "Issues in Homosexuality" on March 1, 1990. The symposium will be held in Lloyd Lobby at 7 p.m. and will explore some current thinking on the issue of Homosexuality.

Panel members include Dr. Glenn Hewitt, Dr. Bob Ramger, and Mark Koerber. Joanna Bender will serve as moderator. The symposium will take a look at homosexuality from ethical, theological, and scriptural perspectives; and as a part of the spectrum of human sexuality.

Panel members will make brief presentations to be followed by a question and answer session.

The purpose of the symposium is to raise student awareness of the issue, provide current information, and help to foster a more compassionate view of homosexuality on Maryville College campus. Everyone in the College community is welcome to attend the symposium, and active participation is encouraged.

Dr. Kim organized Reports from the Field using MC students who spent last semester in Korea as the discussion panel.

Career Day features alumni

Jennifer Raper

I in the right major? What do with my major? HELP! Throughout any college career, there are numerous doubts and questions about what lies in the future.

A student often wonders whether or not he/she belongs in the field which is being pursued and sometimes at the thought of being too broad or too narrowly specialized.

That many students do not realize is that opportunities abound in all fields imaginable and are available to people with various backgrounds, as well as, those who are educated in unassociated fields.

Experienced in this realm of uncertainty are Maryville College alumni who will be available to help with students at our first Campus Wide Career Day, which will be held on March 8, 1990. Representing a variety of fields, the alumni will provide information about their careers and the opportunities attainable in the various outside world.

Career Day will provide an occasion for students and alumni to socialize and will expose students to the infinite career possibilities, which may or may not be related to one's major field of study.

The event also provides an opportunity for students to make possible job contacts regarding summer jobs, internships, and positions for future permanent careers in addition to discussing and organizing research programs.

All departments will be represented by alumni who are anxious to answer any questions relevant to their careers, such as what collegiate activities would be beneficial and how to apply and prepare for their fields.

Not only are students urged to attend the Career Day, but also the faculty. Professors and other staff members will be able to reacquaint themselves with former students and obtain current information about new opportunities and necessary skills that might apply to their present students.

Many of the alumni attending the Career Day will represent the portion of graduates who have discovered careers completely unrelated to their majors.

For example, an English major now works at the U.S. Department of Energy, a Federal Investigator once majored in biology, and a history major has become vice president and media director for Media Dimensions, Inc. Other career fields featured by MC graduates will be advertising, public relations, medicine, research, education, sales, government, health care, social services, information systems, banking, interpreting, media, publishing, business ownership, hospital administration, and technical writing.

Everyone is urged to attend this opportunity to learn about a diverse group of MC alumni and the limitless opportunities available to graduates. The Campus Wide Career Day will be held on Thursday, March 8, 1990.

Get a grip... boys will be boys

Ever since kindergarten, it has been an accepted fact that one bad kid causes the whole class to suffer. One bad apple spoils the bushel, the teacher said.

We are still under the umbrella that demands we account for each other's sins, or bad taste, or stupidity. Call it-- life.

But in college, the grand days of independence and discovery, it gets a little old being sent home because of the raging hormones of one inebriated individual, as was the case this past weekend at the Rhodes concert in Lloyd lobby.

The argument here is not based on fighting. For centuries it has been accepted that men fight, women cry. In today's society, perhaps women fight and men cry. It is a useless but unfortunately, basic instinct of the human being.

The real protest lies in the fact that the city police was called. Did the dorm authorities, or campus security have so little control, or confidence, that they needed such assistance?

And once the irritant was removed from the premises, with or without the assistance of the police, why was the remainder of the students forced to vacate the premises although the concert was far from being finished. These participants were reprimanded for the blanket assumption of alcohol abuse, regardless if they were completely innocent of brawling or drinking. Where were the dorm authorities when this decision was made?

Now there are rumors of a possibly "dry" Mardi Gras and Spring Fling because of this incident, which stems from one obnoxious individual.

Fights will happen. Was the ruckus this weekend such an earth-shattering event anyway to warrant such a hullabaloo?

An additional factor regarding the restrictions on upcoming events is the fact that a 'dry' status would only prevent those 21 and over from bringing alcoholic refreshments. It will not affect those students, particularly those under age, who seem to have no problem "arriving" at special events in a very happy state.

Instead of punishing the whole class, let's just stand the bad boys (and girls) in a corner, say, in Timbuktu.

That's not quite right Aristotle; you can do it much better. I want to see something more creative tomorrow. No one will ever know if Plato ever espoused such criticism on Aristotle, but it is widely known that Aristotle was the protege of Plato, and that much of his philosophy and thinking was a reaction to Plato. The relationship was simple; Plato was his mentor. The art of mentoring has been widely practiced since the times of ancient Greece, yet it seems to have become an endangered animal in contemporary society.

The mentor is an elder in his chosen field, be it philosophy or economic theory. He is also one who believes in education for its own sake. The brash "publish or perish" fever which has the modern academic world under its spell is one of the chief tumors that is eating away at the mentor and his protege. Reputation, recognition, and mega-bucks are the allure for most modern scientists and alleged humanitarians; but the members of the intellectual camp are not wholly to blame. The members of the business world have surrounded them so as to almost force them to circle their wagons for protection from the outside greed cretins; their pay depends entirely on the number of articles with their name on them, so naturally, a young protege would be seen as a threat to their job security, and is promptly kicked out of the lab or library.

The would-be protege is, in many instances, to blame also.

The protege often is of an arrogant or apathetic lot. The love of the field must be present if the mentoring process will ever bear fruit. The prestige that is briefly acknowledged the protege gains from endless hours perfecting the mentors ideas and theories, not from sitting and dreaming idly of the accolades that may one day be gained. The young intellectual seems to lack the work ethic of the previous generations; however, the lack of guidance in the formidable years easily leads to a lack of ambition and direction in the young would-be protege.

The relationship between a mentor and the protege can be thought of as a two-way street, a Catch-22. Without one, the other need not exist, without the other the one cannot exist. It is a dreadful thing to need guidance and not be able to find it; it is equally dreadful not to pass on the wisdom of years and of experience to the following generation.

see MENTOR page 7

Senior supports TC opinions, offers suggestions to admin

Dear Editor,

In the wake of the series of "TC Talks" commentaries, I feel compelled to voice some concerns I have about the current state of affairs (or apparent state of affairs) at MC.

First, I would like to commend the current administration for its commitment to salvaging the fiscal and physical wreck that MC has become. I understand that great progress has been made in establishing adequate funding of the college, and the physical facilities will soon undergo much needed repairs, renovations, and expansions. Dr. Ferrin is largely responsible for this shift, and he is to be commended; but... (you probably knew this was coming) "TC Talks" has raised an important and valid issue. Where does the college stand at present in terms of its academic health? As a liberal arts college, does Marville College maintain an appropriate curriculum? Does it emphasize fields that are important to the "liberal arts ideal?"

The current state of MC academics makes this a valid concern. Consider the history department. There are only three history professors, two of whom are retirement age.

There is no foreign language department and only one full-time foreign language professor (and a damn good one at that!).

Students complain of an intoxicated fine arts instructor, inadequate arts facilities, and a fire-trap for a theater facility. (Not to mention asbestos in the air).

There is no classics department in spite of a hefty, well publicized endowment made to such a department last year.

On the flip side, Sutton Science Center underwent a major overhaul including a new computer lab and scientific equipment. I recall an announcement stating the college's intention to hire four new faculty members in non-liberal arts fields. In deference to "T.C.," where the hell is PHILOSOPHY!?

I do not raise these questions (and more) in order to illicit pat answers from the administration, but rather to encourage the development of a long-term, ongoing dissemination of information from the top down.

Students, faculty, staff, alumni and friends of the college need to be kept abreast of plans to expand academic department and shift emphasis. They also need a look at the priority list of the current administration.

Maryville College is a collection of endeavour, not a business. Students are investing an important part of their lives in this place. Perhaps the administration could keep the community informed through a bi-monthly newsletter, or monthly presentation at lunch Pearson's.

I will be leaving MC in May with many fond memories and with an education that will (hopefully) stand me in good stead through several more years of graduate school. I am thankful for this.

Yet I encourage the administration to focus on goals that truly will enhance the liberal arts education.

Lady Scots shooting for regional tournament title and Final Four

by Pam Gunter

The Lady Scots basketball team is sharpening their sword and is preparing to challenge the beast (in the form of the NCAA Division III tournament) in their quest to bring home a national championship.

At this stage of the game, the regional playoffs, it is still a little early to think in terms of the championship, as the Lady Scots found out.

Playing in the Women's Intercollegiate Athletic Conference (W.I.A.C.) tournament February 23 and 24 and shooting for a second consecutive W.I.A.C. title, the Lady Scots knew that they only needed a win in their first game to earn a bid to the national tournament.

They made it to the finals of the tournament only to lose to Centre College, who then received an automatic bid to the NCAA tournament.

"It (the Centre loss) was a big disappointment. We were looking to the Final Four, and then we realized we had to take one game at a time," said junior point guard Valerie Matlock.

Despite finishing second in the conference, the team gained one of the four slots in the South Regional playoffs March 2-3.

The other three positions are held by Centre College (which is hosting the tournament), Marymount College, and Roanoke College.

"I think we really can go all the way (to the Final Four), but we have to get off to a better start than we have been," Matlock said.

Indeed, their chances do look good. They have beaten both Centre and Marymount this season, and Marymount has defeated Roanoke.

Regardless of the outcome in the regional contest, the Lady Scots have had more than a successful season. They possess a dazzling 22-4 overall record, 8-3 in their conference.

Their accomplishments are especially amazing because they start one junior, three sophomores, and one freshman, an exceptionally young team by any standards.

The Lady Scots meet Roanoke in their first round game, Friday, March 2 at 8:00 pm at Centre College in Danville, Kentucky. The other first round match-up pits number one seeded Centre against Marymount.

If the Lady Scots beat Roanoke, then they play for the regional title Saturday at 8:00 pm against the winner of the Centre-Marymount game. Otherwise, they play at 6:00 pm on Saturday in the consolation round.

Fighting Scots end their season in blaze of glory

by Pam Gunter

The men's basketball team closed out their season February 24, fighting hard to earn a bid to the NCAA tournament.

Sporting an overall record of 15-7, the Scots had an outside chance of receiving a bid, but they needed to win their last two games and they needed a whole lot of luck.

On Friday, February 23, the Scots narrowly slipped by Rust College, 70-69. They were half way to their goal.

On Saturday, the 24th, seniors Brett Stanley, Brian Bond, and Mark Hurt took the court for the last time as Fighting Scots.

In a blowout, the Scots ripped

Lanc College 96-70, perhaps anticipating the game to be their last of the season and going out in "a blaze of glory."

The back-to-back wins were not enough to convince those who extend bid invitations to include Maryville on the guest list.

Despite not getting into any post-season action, the Scots had a productive season, making the most out of what was supposed to be a "rebuilding" year.

Leading the team in scoring were Brett Farner at 16 points per game (ppg), Brett Stanley with 14 ppg, and Jesse Robinette averaging 12.4 ppg. Farner and Robinette will return for another season.

Scots crack open season with victory

by Jana Dalton

The sign on Coach Ramsey's door reads, "the winner says, it may be difficult, but it is possible."

It seems an appropriate phrase for Ramsey and his 26 member squad who are beginning their 1990 season with determination and a lot of effort.

So far so good. The Scots posted an impressive victory over long standing rival Warren Wilson this past Wednesday, 13-3 in nine innings.

But, as Ramsey said, "you have to win 21 games before you win 22, so the tournament is there, but it is one game at a time."

With a successful season under their belts -- last year they tied the school record with single season wins -- Ramsey plans to maintain the same philosophy this year.

What is the winning ingredient? Ramsey said simply, "it's the 'we' concept." It's a matter of team attitude that unites the team for one common goal.

He explained that the beginning of a new season is a very competitive time with the starting line-up being changed daily. Players are not given positions; they have to be earned, regardless of past performance or records.

"Right now," he continued, "everyone is struggling to show their talents for those starting positions, but when the season begins, we have to pull together as a team; without it we can't win."

This competitiveness is why Ramsey claimed that the first two weeks are crucial to their success. "We'll still be experimenting with various positions or combinations that we have, to get the best team on the field," Ramsey said.

The Scots team boasts several advantages. They have four returning seniors, Ken Barber, Mike Reid, Hank Snyder, and Brett Stanley. They have 12 freshman that will "add needed depth." Ramsey noted Gary Shearer, Scott Watson, and Ron Coleman as his most promising freshman players.

"It was a solid team effort.
If we continue to play as a team, we'll continue to win."

— Coach Ramsey

photos by Kevin Ragdale

Batter Hank Snyder strides toward the mound, anticipating the pitch.

He added that their most improved players were the sophomores. "We put them on the field as starters last year expecting big things from all of them and they rose to the occasion."

The strong point for the Scots at this point is defense, according to Ramsey. "Hitting is a little behind, but it was last year and we came around. Hopefully we can pick up a little faster this year."

The goals for the season are "above 500 ball," plus Ramsey wants the team to master the ability to "make things happen."

"They will strike out, they will get thrown out, we will have to sacrifice a guy to make a run. But you do that to have a winning team," Ramsey said.

Of course, there is always a thorn in every rose and for the Scots it is the same as in all sports, academics. With their playing schedule forced into day games because of lack of night lights, the team inevitably loses class time, regardless of the attempts to schedule games on rotating days.

But the coaching staff does not use this dilemma as an excuse for bad grades. There is a 2.0 GPA requirement and players have set out games when this was not met or when specific academic demands arise.

Coach Ramsey said plainly, "Anywhere, it is academics versus the athlete. But there is an understanding of both here. Without academics you can't be an athlete at Maryville College."

Coach Ramsey confers with assistant coach Rayho on first-game tactics which led to victory over Warren Wilson, 13-3.

Mini coup interrupts dinner

by Jeff Huffman

On the night of February 24, a Palestinian by the name of Abdullah Al-Hasheem, a Maryville College International student, gave a speech at the International Dinner. He spoke of his views of the current turmoil in his country.

In his speech, Al-Hasheem spoke of the Israeli violence in Palestine and of American policy and attitude of the situation. Al-Hasheem noted that most television and other forms of media were responsible for the negative attitude of the United States. He pointed out that the American media "only show[s] the violence on the Jewish, not on Palestinians."

After his speech, a man in the audience raised a question to Al-Hasheem, even though questions were not invited. The man inquired about Al-Hasheem's United States citizenry and about the persecution of the Jewish in Palestine. Al-Hasheem declined to respond, since the field was not open to questions and because his english-speaking skills were not as developed as the normal American.

Al-Hasheem, in an interview, said "I did not say I was an American; I said I'm in America."

He also said his speech was "just my opinion. . . you say what's in your mind and in your heart."

Al-Hasheem noted that in America, there is the right to the freedom of speech. He said "It is my right to express my opinion."

He added "I feel embarrassed because I can't debate [with] him since my language is not . . . english."

The man who raised the questions was unavailable for comment.

ration who will one day be responsible for leading society.

But here at MC, the would-be protege should feel at home. Maryville, like most smaller "liberal-arts" colleges, prides itself on the notion that the faculty is to teach. The vice of publishing has not yet been formed here (hopefully, it never will). The teachers here are just that, teachers. Logically, the art of mentoring should be in full effect in an environment such as MC offers. But where is it? Apathy seems to be the favorite vice around the campus now. The students are namely to blame, but the administration is also to fault as well.

The student body at MC seems to be gung-ho for one thing -- today's golden calf -- greenbacks. That's fine to an extent, but there is something both hilarious and pathetic about many people with the same ambition and thoughts. But the administration has not tried to deter the dollar-lust of today. They have actually set up roadsigns to make it easier to find. While almost every other department boasts non-existent majors and faculties who are overworked, the business department seems to be growing. If the faculty would wish to take on a protege, most would not have time because of the excessive demand on their time.

The small "liberal-arts" college was once thought to be a place of academic variety and a place to get to know the faculty and to work along side them. However, if the administration does not roadblock the advance of greed, the sign at the campus will soon read, "Maryville Junior College of Business Administration."

Enjoy your stay.

'Daisy' graces older generation

by Kathleen McArthur

This season's latest hit, Driving Miss Daisy, is a touching story of true friendship in a world that continues to grow older with the change of life's seasons. The joys and sorrows of old age are revealed in this wondrous account of an elderly Jewish widow and her endearing relationship with her black chauffeur. Living in the fifties and early sixties, this pair must face the restrictions society and its prejudices have placed on their lives.

Miss Daisy, played by Jessica Tandy, is a righteously independent woman who takes care of herself and has no desire to accept any help that cannot be offered by her long-time maid. Unfortunately, the maid does not drive, and Miss Daisy refuses to see that her operating skills are also less than desirable. Her devoted son, played by Dan Aykroyd, hires a driver without her consent, and she makes every effort to prove she does not need his assistance. Her attitude is like that of many older people, fully determined and brutally stubborn. Morgan Freeman plays the driver, Hoke, with wonderful feeling and breath-taking presence. His character is equally head-strong, and he has set his mind to taking care of his new "friend". These personalities, intertwined, create a hilarious series of events that leave the audience gasping for air.

Over a period of years the two find a common ground of acceptance and begin to mutually depend on one another. Despite this closeness, they are never able to share life due to the societal norms of the era. It is a story of a woman who fully depends on the friendship and care of a man that will never be considered equal in her lifetime. The only sense of equality he can feel is knowing his love is returned. Driving Miss Daisy is the most realistic and thought-provoking display of the trials of getting older to ever grace the screen.

'Sorceress' presents thrilling fantasy story

by Travis Crabtree

Raw, frenzied, unrestrained ... fantasy. If you read David Eddings' fourth book in the Mallorean series, The Sorceress of Darshiva, that is what you will experience. Eddings' book is filled with enchanting lyricism, characters who might at any time extend a hand to the reader to join them, and unerring comedic lines which never seem to stray from the target.

The Sorceress of Darshiva is actually the ninth book of Eddings' which employs the same basic characters, each with a different and mysterious task that will ultimately fulfill an ancient prophesy. Yet this rather common theme in most modern fantasy novels is rejuvenated by Eddings' pen; it becomes almost a new genre which combines the classic elements of a Dickensian novel and the fantastic scope of Tolkien.

Lying at the core of these novels is a system of philosophy unique to Eddings. It seems that very early in the formation of the universe, something separated from the whole. This separation caused the creation of another possible destiny for the universe; it is called the Dark Prophecy for its aim is the destruction of the whole from which it was very early separated. Now these two entities have been converging on one another since before the beginning of history.

And it is in the final days before this meeting that the novel takes place. At the center of the novel is Garion, the fabled Child of Light, representing the entity which strives to bring order to the world, and his adversary is Zandramas, the one who might bring chaos into the world.

But fear not, Eddings mixes into this philosophic soup spices of comedy (guffaws are not uncommon), romance, pointed dialogue, and an endearing love for the characters. In all likelihood, pangs of regret and blatant sentimentalism will overcome you when you get near the end of the book and must wait for the next to be published.

So run, don't walk down to the local bookstore and start reading. And maybe you too will know how the universe will end!

Kiss my blarney stone

by Tim Lister

There has been a special occasion for the past couple of months, and now it is March. What is so special about March? Nothing. Let's throw in St. Patrick's Day. February has a day for St. Valentine and it works. Why not do the same thing in March? Because it is dumb.

What purpose does St. Patrick's Day serve? At least on Valentine's Day you could vow your love to someone. God forbid. St. Patrick's Day is just a time when anyone who has the tiniest trace of Irish blood slaps on a button that testifies to their heritage. "Kiss me I'm Irish" was probably started by some drunk in a pub who couldn't think of a pick up line. Why do the Irish get special treatment? Why don't you see buttons that say, "I'm from Swazi Land, give me a hug"?

What is the connection between dwarfs and holidays? Leprechauns suddenly become popular around the beginning of March. Leprechauns are just rejects that couldn't hack it at Santa's Workshop.

Clover also becomes popular around this time. Clover is a weed. What does vegetation have to do with the holidays anyway? Why clover? Why not kudzu, or possibly crabgrass?

I wonder how many fights have started over the color green. I'm sure that over the years not every person that was pinched for not wearing green responded with holiday cheer. You know it is a dumb occasion when a tradition is to pinch someone for not following tradition.

For those who can get excited over St. Patrick's Day, kiss my Blarney Stone.

Prof responds to letter to editor

To the Editor:

I read with interest the letter of the soon-to-graduate senior and the recent articles of Travis Crabtree lamenting the state of the liberal arts at Maryville College. I would agree that one would expect the traditional liberal arts subjects--history, literature, philosophy, and languages--to abound at a liberal arts college if they are to do so anywhere. Nobody regrets their enfeebled condition more than the faculty, who recall the "good old days" when we had them. However, the situation at Maryville College reflects a sad state of affairs that is a concern of liberal arts colleges across the nation and not confined specifically to this campus; that is, the present generation of vocationally-oriented students (and their vocationally-oriented parents) do not support liberal arts programs to a degree that would allow such programs to thrive. A college the size of Maryville cannot realistically put a course on the class schedule, reserve a room, acquire the needed library resources, and then hire a faculty member who will sit in the classroom and twiddle his/her thumbs. If students want to have these courses, they must exhibit their interest and enthusiasm by enrolling in them. At present, I teach a second-year language class with nine students and a third-year class with enrollment of twenty-two students has at present dwindled to eight hard-working, dedicated souls (there goes your "classics" program). The reason your teachers at Maryville College are such a harried lot is not the fault of the administration. It is, rather, due

Davey Reed is campus clown, etc.

By Tim Lister

He is the free throw shooting Joker at the basketball game, and the screamin' Italian son and overall clad redneck at the home cooked dinners at Pearsons. He is the dynamic eccentric that annoys you at lunch with announcements. He is Maryville College's Davey Reed.

Davey is a Biology Major who said, "According to the registrar's office I'm still a junior." Being only an hour short of senior status, Davey still participates in the senior functions. He said "At 100 Days President Ferrin asked when I was planning on graduating. I told him not for a couple of years and that I was Jon Allison's date."

Davey lives in Franklin, Tennessee, but was born in Alabama. He said, "Alabama isn't that bad. I had no choice in where I was born."

I asked Davey what brought him to Maryville, and he said that when Coach Ramsey got him out of an English exam to talk about baseball, he decided he would give it a shot.

Currently, Davey is involved with Student Programming. He is also a former member of the Student Senate and Fighting Scots Baseball Team.

As we talked in his room, I noticed a massive inflatable shark hanging from the ceiling, a stuffed goose that looked as if it had just flown in his window from outside, and Star Wars sheets on an unmade bed that screamed Davey Reed lives here. As I looked around the room, he said, "It is a big room. I think we'll have Spring Fling in here this year."

When I asked him about his greatest experience at Maryville, he simply said, "Freshman year, my first keg party." He reminisced about being a freshman and saying, "Beer's my middle name. I love beer. Yeah." He talked about his freshman Homecoming and how he didn't have a date, but escorted five girls.

When Davey leaves Maryville, he wants to leave behind an empty space and information about the college and faculty. He said, "You have to know what buttons to push when, so you can do things and not get in trouble."

Davey felt there was something that needed to be said in the paper for all of the school to read. I awaited anxiously for his words of wisdom as he said, "There is a really neat echo in front of Copeland." He said there is a paticular sound that works best, and he was kind enough to demonstrate for me. Imagine the sound of an infant teradactyl being smashed by a steam roller. I have yet to try it, but Davey said, "It is especially good at night or early in the morning."

In light of the upcoming Spring Break and Davey's somewhat offcenter humor, I asked him if he were a drink what would he be. With a gleam of inspiration in his eye and a wicked laugh he said, "Screaming Orgasm."

Truly Davey Reed.

to the fact that our time is often consumed by multiple, complicated class preparations for a few deserving, but sparse, individuals.

If the liberal arts are to survive anywhere, colleges need students who don't want to "be" any specific thing after they graduate but educated. According to the Wall Street Journal, there is no particular major that will guarantee automatic employment, acceptance to graduate school, or future success in business. A "vocational" degree and fifty cents will only guarantee you a bus ride to the employment agency.

However, the column was not aimed at MC, whose business department has been called overly humanities oriented by other overly specialized schools, but at the national trends which allow such schools to criticize MC and the contemporary teaching of liberal arts as unnecessary and fiscally unrewarding.

In my conversation with VP Boldon, the word "fiscal" never arose, but the word "rewarding" did.

VP Boldon seemed to continually connect the word "rewarding" with his previous teaching experiences. And that is just who should run a small school: educators who have never lost their zeal for the classroom or the teaching experience.

Thus, it is now in a different light that I view the administration. I see them now (and I hope you will too) not as "what is the bottom-line" minded bureaucrats, but as educators making it a little easier for other educators to teach and work. Correct me if I'm wrong, but isn't that how a liberal arts college should be run?

Another eyebrow-raising edition of TC Talks dealt with the advance of business-oriented teaching over traditional the traditional liberal arts curriculum.

What's goin' on?

by Craig Farmer

What do sexy, sleezy, sexual partners, lots of alcohol, and a free four year scholarship at Maryville have to do with this story?

Not a damn thing, but I did get your attention and it is a shame such sewer-like tactics have to be used to make people at Maryville look.

By now you all know about the town meeting that was held in order to make people think. Hah, I say, phooey. The stuffed shirt speeches went well, but the generalized discussions about artificial case studies were very unsatisfying to the people who really know what is going on around this campus.

Having symposiums and discussions are a wonderful thing, but talking about "A Day in Barcelona" is not going to get people to stop drinking and driving.

How many people are going to have to suffer from the lack of campus involvement and ineffective administrative programs?

Enough, I say, it is time to get the students together again. No more racism, no more stupid news broadcasts, and no more beating around the bush.

If something is going wrong with the food, the alcohol, or the sex on this campus, then damn it treat us like students who pay a fortune to go here and tell us what the hell is going on.

I propose a new town meeting that takes place in each dorm that discusses real problems that happen on this campus and how we as individuals can make this world a better place.

I also propose a "Designated Driver" program that is badly needed on this campus and should not be overlooked in order to avoid ruining the Maryville College reputation that once existed.

Marvin Gaye once sang "What's going on?" Well? Could it be that people know what's going on, but don't want to have to share in the blame or are too set in their ways to find a solution...

WHATA DRAG!

by Jennifer Raper

It is amazing how many hidden talents and honors our faculty at Maryville College possess and how little they are recognized for their accomplishments. Two such professors are Dr. Bunde and Dr. Brunger, who are the reigning Drag Queen Contest winners on campus.

Dr. Bunde feels that being crowned queen is a dubious honor, but it provoked him to consider a professional career in New Orleans where his new identity would be a little less conspicuous and the opportunities would abound. Dr. Bunde's family takes pride in his achievement, especially his wife who spent an entire evening hand making his beautiful set of locks.

Upon being asked how he became interested in this type of activity, Dr. Bunde grinned mischievously, and his reply was tainted with sarcasm, "It was time for me to come out of the closet." Seriously, he will try anything once. The first time which he established his spontaneity occurred about six years ago. As he entered his organic chemistry class, he noticed that each student was wearing his/her slippers. Initially, he feared that they were expressing a clue about his lectures, but he then played along with the joke, promising to wear a pair while lecturing if he had any. The next morning a fresh pair of brown puppy slippers appeared on his desk. Keeping his promise, Dr. Bunde slipped on his new, fashionable dogs and commenced lecturing. A Bunde never goes back on his word!

Dr. Bunde, who claims that his "underarms will never be the same," generously shared his title with Dr. Brunger, the representative from Africa. Because ballots were miscounted, the judges crowned two queens this year. Sharing the title, according to Dr. Bunde, encourages an internationalization of the contest and of the title.

Dr. Brunger feels as though the contest has changed his life due to all of the weird looks he has been receiving. Being the representative from Africa, Dr. Brunger feels that he truly played his role and fit in with the culture in which men dress up in women's attire and perform rituals in order to make fun of women. Astounded by the professional makeover given by the cheerleaders, Dr. Brunger now is "suspicious of feminine faces" and fears what is hidden underneath women's makeup.

Although Dr. Brunger has no past record of such activities, he entered the contest while his wife was out of town, but upon her arrival home she regretted missing the hilarious event. Dr. Brunger was decked out in one of his wife's dresses and has a complete makeover.

Dr. Bunde and Dr. Brunger both agree that Dr. Howard stole the show with his superb makeup and revealing dress, and both feel a threat to their crowns in next year's contest.

There once was a professor named Bunde,
Who thought his students were sluts

I SAID A BUTT LIGHT

Gross bloody, gorey, stupid reviews of 'B' ('B' for bad) movies

by John Worth

BOO!! Did I scare you? I hope not, but somewhere in the vast M.C. community somebody may have been shocked by my bold interjection. Granted no heart attacks occurred, but a possible EEK might have been exclaimed. If you (yes, you) were taken aback, then the following movies are for you. But be forewarned: These movies are not for the weak at heart (or stomach); you could die laughing, a most ungratifying way to go.

Blood Shack: Now this is a winner. I mean, if you like to laugh-a lot-then by all means watch this movie. I watched it on fast forward search. It is that good. Let me paint in words the plot: There is a house in the middle of the desert somewhere and-surprise-it is haunted. There is a caretaker who attempts to warn people about this broadsword wielding Jason-like beast, but no one listens. A strange girl who happens upon the house is dared by friends to stay the night and...well, I don't want to ruin the story for all potential viewers. One of the more memorable lines from this flick is, "I told them not to go in there." Wow, what a chiller. I get the willies just thinking about it. I give Blood Shack loser status.

Redneck Zombies From Hell: The title is enough to say it all. If not, the box reads "Tobacco chewing, dirt stomping zombies from Hell." The story surrounds a hillbilly family that makes moonshine from a toxic waste barrel. This flick gives you the 'home video' effect (if you don't understand, watch it). But don't turn off this movie until you see the cliffhanger ending. Although the movie is dumber than most, it was intended that way and has some good gore. This movie deserves cool status.

Cannibal Camp Out: Some movies do not even require discussion; they are either real good or real bad, depending on the person. I being a strange individual like this movie: It has some good one-liners and a lot of needless violence. Rent it. Watch it with some friends who are either drunk or weird. Take it back with your own opinions of it. But let me say this: When viewed in the right frame of mind with the right attitude, this movie is hilarious in its stupidity. If you don't like stupid movies, then don't watch this one. But don't stop reading my article. It gets better, I promise.

Blood Frenzy: Odd, but good. The plot is thought provoking and the cinematography is decent to good. It lacks a lot in scariness, but it has credentials. A couple of the actors may strike you as familiar from some other movie but you can't quite place their faces. One of the characters has a monologue that is above average to very good. The movie is not that bad. Of course, it isn't that great. I mean, it isn't Batman. It does deserve cool status.

Killer Klowns From Outer Space: It sounds bad, I know. But this movie is good. It is genuinely funny and has some very good effects. It was filmed by a bunch of unknown people who had to have some kind of money because it is made like a real film. And again some of the actors will seem familiar. The plot is given in the title and is not complex. A bunch of aliens who look like Barnum rejects set up a circus outside of town and attempt to take over. It has some great one-liners like, "What are you gonna do, knock my block off (ha, ha, ha)?" Not meaning to give away the story, but the clown does. This movie deserves the status of stuper stud.

If anyone is left reading at this point, please don't think I am too wierd, not that you would be wrong. If you don't know me, don't go telling your roommate that you think I am very weird, again not too far from the truth. These movies are not meant to be taken seriously. They are made for enjoying their stupidity, of which they have lots. So go out and rent movies. Rent these. But rent them only if you know that they are ignorant, idiotic, and funny.

Spring to be flung in House in the Woods

by Kathleen McArthur

The location for this year's Spring Fling has been decided. The dance will be held at the "House in the Woods" on campus.

There will be a covered dance floor set up outside, and complete music by a disc jockey will be provided. In case of rain, the walkway from inside to outside will also be covered.

Food and beverages will be served in the house on the first floor.

The dance will be semi-formal, so please no jeans. Student Programming Co-Chairman Davey Reed said, "This is the nicest event we throw all year, it's going to be really fun. You can have homecoming in a barn if you want, but Spring Fling is the biggest party and everybody whose anybody will be there! You can't miss this one!"

The dance will be held on Saturday May 5 from 9 PM until 2 AM. Tickets are $3.50 per person.

Mother Nature assists Earth Day efforts with rain (the evidence is on the camera lens) as Dr. Randolph Shields and Senator Albert Gore plant a sugar maple.

'Rimers' encores Friday, Saturday

by Pam Gunter

As "tech week" drew to a close, the MC Theatre group put on the finishing touches to their Spring production, "The Rimers of Eldritch."

The play, written by Lanford Wilson, differs from this year's previous productions in several ways, including subject matter and genre (it's not a comedy), the passage of time within the play (it's not linear), and the action, which is "very ensemble" according to theatre director Karen Gygli.

The story begins in the middle, or rather close to the end, and then the audience "learns the story through bits of memory here and there, just like in real life," Gygli said. "The action in the other productions has been linear or chronological, and this play is done very cinematically, with flashbacks and flashforwards," she added.

The subject matter is one of the reasons Gygli chose the play, because, as she said, "it is important to have a play a little more adventurous." That is the reason for the disclaimers on the

Varner wins vote for Student Senate

by Travis Crabtree

The results have been tallied by the prestigious accounting firm of Price - Waterhouse, and Chattanooga Christopher Varner is the Student Senate President-Elect.

A vocal and boisterous lad of 20, Varner feels confident that next year will be a good one for Student Senate, and it looks like he is right: there are more people running for the Senate than ever before.

But Varner wants to add that he feels that the relationship between the administration and the Senate "should not be an adversarial one."

"I feel that sort of relationship would be highly detrimental to both the administration and the Senate," Varner added.

Our new president is not a johnny-come-lately to the demands of responsibility. He is a Presidential Scholar, a former president of the freshman class, and a member of the Student Foundation.

Academics is not the only area in which Varner excels. Wherever there is an intramural sport, he can be found there. You can also look for Varner on the second floor of Lloyd reverently reading the sports page or even in Knoxville doing stand-up comedy on the side. But if there is a Cincinnati Reds game playing, Varner can always be found nearby.

"I'm an I-75 baby," grins the president-elect. He has lived in Cincinnati, Chattanooga, Cincinnati, and finally back to Chattanooga.

When asked about the Pete Rose incident, he responded with a cautious "no comment," but the student body can rest easy knowing that whenever their interests are at question, he will always comment on their behalf.

Knight recovers in spinal clinic

by Tim Lister

Freshman Bill Knight was in a serious auto accident March 10 that left him with a neck fracture and a broken arm as he was returning from Knoxville.

Bill was taken to the University of Tennessee Medical Center for two weeks and was in ICU for ten days.

On March 23 Bill was flown to Atlanta and was admitted to the Sheppard Spinal Clinic. Bill is now able to walk again, but will have to remain in a halo that immobilizes his neck for two more months.

Bill said that he spends most of his time at the hospital in therapy. His morning therapy teaches him to use his legs again while his afternoon therapy teaches him how to use his arms. Bill seems to have a good attitude and expects to fully recover.

In a few weeks Bill will be visiting high schools around his area to speak about drinking and driving.

Bill does not expect to return to Maryville. He wishes to thank everyone for their thoughts, prayers, and cards.

What are the MC drinking habits ?

Recent events that involved alcohol use and abuse nationwide, as well as on the MC campus, prompted the Echo staff to poll the student body concerning their drinking habits.

Out of the students polled, 98 percent reported that they drank alcoholic beverages, but only 40 percent were of legal drinking age - the average age was less than 21.

The frequency in which the drinkers consumed alcohol was evenly distributed. In response to whether they drank once, 2-5 times, or more than five times a week, 26 percent said once a week, 40 percent said 2-5 times a week, and 32 percent said they drank more than five times a week. Two percent reported that they drank once a month.

Liquor topped beer and wine as the favorite drink, with 58 percent of those polled preferring the "hard stuff." Thirty-seven percent liked beer the best, and wine was preferred by only 5 percent.

A whopping 90 percent of the respondents said they drank on-campus, and an equal amount reported that they drank off-campus.

Unfortunately, almost half of the drinkers admitted to drinking and driving.

On the brighter side, 71 percent said that they have designated drivers, and 15 percent said they used designated drivers at least occasionally.

Despite Knight's accident alcohol policy stands

by Christen Anderson

The MC alcohol policy will undergo no changes, despite freshman Bill Knight's accident which according to the Tennessee Highway Patrol was alcohol related.

MC President Dick Ferrin stated that no alterations will be made in the present college alcohol policy.

"All of us have the responsibility not to drink and drive," said Ferrin. "No college policy can affect that."

"We can't have a policy that's against the law," echoed Sue Wyatt, Vice-President for Student Development. "We evaluate the policy annually to refine and improve it."

The president emphasized that students' accident rate has to do with personal responsibility, not college policy. He said that he knew of no other accidents similar to Knight's that occurred when alcohol was allowed on campus.

"The myth of fun equated with getting drunk is a connection I fail to understand," Ferrin said. "It's part of a sickness in our culture."

Ferrin could provide no answers to the problem of MC students having no designated areas in which to hold functions with alcohol, without having to drive to Knoxville.

The MC alcohol policy which was implemented in the fall of 1989 states that alcohol is allowed on campus in specifically designated areas or at special occasions. Only students over the age of 21 may consume personally purchased alcohol on campus. The alcohol policy follows the Tennessee State Code and the Maryville Municipal Code.

Wyatt pointed out that college functions that traditionally have had alcohol will not be changed. According to Wyatt, alcohol will be served at Homecoming, 100 Days, Mardi Gras, Spring Fling, and the Comps Reception. Alcohol offered at these gatherings will be in clearly designated areas. Functions with alcohol are also allowed in Pearsons Hall with the consent of the Student Development Office.

Asked about his goals for implementing the present alcohol policy, Ferrin cited halting underage drinking and attacking the problem of a drinking and driving culture.

I hate to think students are leaving MC as problem drinkers -- not for MC's reputation, but for the sake of people's lives," Ferrin said.

He stated that he thinks the new policy has stopped students who do not drink from getting involved in drinking or at parties at which alcohol is present.

"I think the community's perception of the school now is that MC is trying to deal with a serious problem in society," Ferrin said.

Wyatt said "The alcohol policy has made students more cautious and thoughtful in their behavior. People are being smarter in how they conduct themselves, and that's progress."

T.C. Talks: not even 'Bo Knows' ALC

by Travis Crabtree

O.K., question number one goes out to the entire student body (except for two, of course). Who can tell me what the Academic Life Council (ALC) is?

Much later... still no response. The reason that no one at MC can give a detailed account of the ALC is that for the most part it seems that no one is supposed to know any specifics on the organization or its power. Thus, the organization seems to have a free hand to determine the best interests of the student body without any mediation between the ALC and the student body. Actually, the only time that these three super secret letters ALC are ever heard around campus is after the Council has already determined the supposed interests to the student body.

Question number two is a trick question, so be alert. What about Student Senate?

Much, much later... being in attendance to the Senate meetings is an experience totally unique to MC. The powers of the Senate presently rival that of Kermit the Frog's as the green puppet swerves to and fro under the mighty arm of Jim Henson, except in this case, the controlling agent isn't a bearded man with the initials J.H., but an unknown and extremely powerful organization on campus known as ALC.

I could have done lots of digging and gritty investigative work to uncover something about the ALC, but I think that it is a scary thing (especially on such a small campus) that such work would have to be done to learn about an organization that basically seems to make decisions which affect the entire student body.

The fact that all the meetings of the ALC are closed to the public does not help their image problem either. I thought that in a small college environment, open forums and discussions would not only be allowed but would be encouraged.

Sure, there is the Senate, but the purpose of the Senate - at least the purpose that I gathered from the last meeting - seems to be that of only of giving opinions and views; continually, the ALC representative stressed that the new grading system would be passed. It would just give a nice appearance to the ALC's decision if the Senate would approve it. Maybe a few consciousness would be eased as well.

But, the Senate held true to its purpose, reflecting and vocalizing student sentiment and concerns, and downed the new grading system proposal. Unfortunately, it seems that the opinions and concerns of the student body will not be enough to stop this new system from being implemented

see ALC page 8

Worth Saving.

This week's editorial...

Okay, Earth Day is over.
We planted a tree.

Now can someone answer these three questions?

(1) Why doesn't Blount County have a residential pick-up for recyclable products?

(2) Why doesn't Maryville College recycle glass and plastic campus wide?

(3) Why does Maryville College still use STYROFOAM items in Pearson's and Isaac's?

Spring issue spawns criticism

Dear Staff Members;

A question to you all! Do you feel good about the current issue of the Echo? Does the degenerate state you have permitted yourself to fall into really make you feel good about yourselves and the paper? I wonder...I hope not!

As an alumna of the college and a staff member, I am ashamed of you and for you.

The issue was not a total disappointment. TC Talks was especially worthwhile this time. Craig Farmer's material is thought provoking and needed to be said for all of us. There was more on the positive side.

It was difficult to find the good material almost hidden in the rest; it seems some people are into "Hurt", "Shock", and "Destroy". [sic] I heard someone say that if the issue was to be light and funny spring break style -- it failed the course; it was degrading, sour and sad.

Yes, I will continue to look forward to the Echo's arrival. It is my hope that the philosophy will begin to think of change; it is difficult talking with prospective students about the campus news paper [sic] when you have to think twice before showing it.

Closing question: Would you want this issue in your portfolio if you needed examples of journalism for a job or an award?????????

Sincerely,
Annabelle Libby '92
Admissions

Staff reacts to Libby's letter

by Travis Crabtree

Student response and comments about the last edition of the paper were very positive, but some administrators highly disapproved of the layout, polls, and general ambience of the last issue.

So, the question of whose paper the Echo really is arises. The student body's is the swift and honest answer.

But it seems that some want to change the focus of the paper, virtually taking away one of the last true bastions of honest student opinions and views left at MC.

The paper, they say, should be a tool for recruitment and a pacifier for alumni and parents. Now these ideas truly seem embarrassing. For in them is the implication that the paper and those who work for it (as well as the entire student body) are irrelevant and should devote themselves and their ideas not to their generation and contemporaries but to previous generations and future ones.

Now, please do not misunderstand and think of me as self-concerned and egotistical, for I realize that responsibilities are owed to all.

The students were anxious for spring break, and realizing just how tedious those last few days were going to be for the students, the Echo decided to try to relieve some of the pre-break pressure.

Certainly, the issue shall not win a Pulitzer or other such award, but it did get some to smile and even laugh and for a short time forget about the many tests awaiting them before break began: it served a need of the student body. It did exactly what it should, and no apologies shall be issued for a success.

Teamwork is Lady Scots' winning ingredient

by Pam Gunter

"Work done by a number of associates, usually each doing a clearly defined portion, but all subordinating personal prominence to the efficiency of the whole" -- Webster's definition of teamwork.

Other people like to say that a good team functions 'like a well-oiled machine.'

Whatever your choice, the MC Lady Scots softball team surely fits into either description.

After a disheartening 0-4 start and an early season crisis, the Lady Scots have come together and won 15 out of their last 20 games.

Attributing the complete turn around to teamwork, Lady Scots catcher Wendy Kallstrom said, "the team really pulled together after the [0-4 start]."

Centerfielder Angie Lawler echoed this sentiment. "Lately, we've really come around. Since Spring Break we're working better as a team," she said.

Watching the team play, this becomes readily apparent: "congratulations" after a good hit or a good defensive play, a pat on the back with an "it's o.k." after a strike-out or other misfortune, and a general congeniality characterize the team.

"It's the only team I've ever been on that everybody likes everybody else," Kallstrom said.

As the Lady Scots played in their last home games of the season April 24, they proved that the talk about teamwork was more than talk.

Playing Lee College in a double-header, the ladies won the first game 6-2 with a rally in the last few innings.

In the second game, the Lady Scots blasted Lee 17-7, ending the game in the fifth inning because of the "10-run rule."

Much of the team's success stems from a balanced attack of offense and defense. Behind the strong, consistent pitching of senior Missy Barker and solid defensive play, the team keeps opponents' run totals low.

On offense, as Kallstrom described, somebody usually picks up the slack. "If the infield isn't hitting, then the outfield is, or vice versa," she said.

Being able 'to pick up' the slack helped the Lady Scots take second place at a tournament at Columbus College on April 20-21.

In the four-team round robin tournament, the team slipped past Division I schools Mercer University and Georgia Tech University to meet Columbus College in the finals.

In the championship game, Division II Columbus narrowly edged the Lady Scots by one run in the bottom of the seventh inning.

The Lady Scots close out their season this weekend, April 27-29, against Cumberland University, Austin-Peay University, and Tennessee Tech University.

On Friday, the team plays Cumberland in Lebanon, TN at 3:00 pm CST. Saturday, they play in Clarksville, TN against Austin-Peay at 1:00 pm CST. The season finale is Sunday at 2:00 pm CST in Cookeville, TN against Tennessee Tech.

Chances slim for baseball post-season

by John Worth

Spring is a time of the virtues of American Life: Apple pie, mom, and baseball. While the first two aren't always found on the M.C. campus (great as it is), baseball can.

The MC baseball team finished their season at 13-7, only playing half of the games on their schedule.

They should have played 40 games, but some were called off because of rain. The other teams cancelled a few times because some conference teams had to make up inter-conference games.

The administration also made the team cut out a few games. Regardless of the reason, the team missed 20 games and their record suffered for it.

"The players work hard and deserve a full season," head coach

Ronnie Ramsey said. There was a "lack of team rhythm" because of the shortened season, he added.

Yet the season had a few bright points for the team. They beat Berry College, a top-notch team, and they beat Tennessee Wesleyan, who beat the University of Tennessee a week later.

According to Ramsey, sophomore catcher Scotty Cline did "a great job behind the plate" and was a team leader and good controller.

Two other sophomores, Clint Boling and Neal Pelletier, also contributed to the team's success.

All three were starters as freshmen and had experience that paid off. But the whole team played well and all deserve credit for the wins.

Now that the season is over, Ramsey is looking toward next year. The team will consist mostly of sophomore and junior players, with two seniors rounding out the squad, not to mention incoming freshmen.

He hopes to get in a full season. But more importantly, he thinks that being a member of a conference could make the biggest difference.

"Not being in a conference hurt us," Ramsey said. "Conference teams have a guaranteed number of games within the conference that have to be played."

The 1990 season is all but gone (although the team could still make it to the NCAA Division III tournament, but "chances are slim"). So, the returning players will have to wait until next season, when they will be stronger and better, and hopefully able to play a full season up to their capabilities.

posters advertising the production. There is strong language and some sexual content (a rape but no nudity), but overall, it is a play that makes people think.

The action centers around three characters - Eva Jackson, Skelley Manor, and Robert Conklin - played by Stephanie Thrasher, John Worth, and Spears Driskell, respectively.

Worth's character, Skelley, is the "town outcast, sort of a wise fool and tragic hero," Gygli described. Because he is on the outside looking in, Skelley can see through everybody's lies, and that is why he is an "old, grungy" loner.

Driskell plays Robert, a kid living in the shadow of his older brother who was admired by the townspeople and was killed in a tragic car crash. As a result, Robert becomes alienated and another misfit.

Eva, played by Thrasher, the third societal outcast, manages to associate with Robert and form a sort of friendship. The two begin as misfits but become twisted and evil just like the rest of the townspeople.

To learn how Eva and Robert befriend each other and then become "twisted," attend one of the final showings, Friday, April 27 or Saturday, April 28 at 8:15 pm.

Abortion memorial on Old Knoxville Highway prompted reporter to poll campus opinion.

Campus polled on Abortion

by Christen Anderson

What are your views on abortion? The issue has raised the interest of millions of Americans in recent months with stricter abortion bills being proposed in Guam and Idaho. Idaho pro-lifers are trying to pass bills which bar abortion for rape victims unless the crime is reported to police within seven days. The proposed bill also allows for abortion only in the case of pro-found incest or if the mother's life is endangered by pregnancy.

Advocates of pro-choice are trying to prevent legislatures from passing bills restricting women's right to abortion and are relying on governors to veto any bills that pass legislatures. Through the use of demonstrations, the pro-choice group is pushing the government not to infringe upon the private lives of U.S. citizens.

"Abortion should be the woman's decision, not some old Congressman's."

Fifty MC students were asked how they would vote if they had to vote on an abortion bill. The results were:

MALE:
Pro-choice
87%

FEMALE:
Pro-choice
91%

98% of the students polled did not think abortion would be outlawed in the future in the United States.

STUDENTS REACTIONS TO THE ABORTION ISSUE:

"People are going to have abortions anyway, and it would be dangerous if it wasn't legal."

"In cases of rape, or if both the girl and her boyfriend are in school and cannot afford to have a child, abortion should be an alternative."

"A woman should be able to make decisions about her own body."

"Women should consider adoption before abortion."

Senior hits nerve with art exhibit

by Jennifer Raper

A senior art student at Maryville College has focused on and has targeted many social problems which should not be ignored by society in her senior art exhibit, entitled "Social Concerns."

Traci McDonell brought to the observer an awareness of several critical issues which could possibly affect anyone at any given time, either directly or indirectly, through her exhibit entitled "Social Concerns."

Although the exhibit was comprised of three main sections (social concerns, advertisement, and general entertainment), McDonell stressed the importance of the need for an awareness of social concerns.

The spark that inspired her to express her feelings toward these concerns was the narrow-mindedness of the people attending the forum on homosexuality held on campus several weeks ago. Disgusted by the closed-mindedness and hypocritical attitudes, McDonell decided to express her unsettled emotions through painting subjects which most people choose to ignore or do not appear to be concerned about, believing that the problems are so remote that they are not and will not be affected by them.

Contrary to her quiet and reserved personality, McDonell's exhibit boldly made a statement about pressing issues. Realizing that she is graduating in a few weeks, she desired to make a statement before leaving college rather than remaining "out of the way."

Through her exhibit, she stressed the fact that a social problem could strike people's ignorant, private worlds.

Reactions to her "Social Concerns" were mixed but had a common point. Most were disturbed by the graphic representation of the exhibit.

Evoking this slight repulsion signified to Traci that her goal had been achieved, to make people think, to move them, and to make them aware of the current social issues which are plaguing our society.

Touching upon several great problems, McDonell included homelessness, abortion, and homosexuality in her exhibit. The first painting of her concerns series was Awaiting Opportunity, depicting in detail the hopelessness of one who does not have a home.

Others, such as Aborted, did not contain as much detail, but rather a graphic abstract representation of the issue.

Forbidden Love, however, represented more than just an incomprehensible problem. Difficulty in technique as well as in understanding the fear of the word "homosexuality" was represented in this work. The lines hinted at the image of homosexuality and at society's vague knowledge of the subject.

Far from being a "liberal hippie," Traci McDonell wishes that she could talk to everyone about these social issues so that the problems may be "re-evaluated by each individual."

If she was able to confront everyone, people might become aware of the problems and stop using and taking for granted the society's view toward these issues and form more individualized views accompanied by solutions as opposed to ignorance.

instituted, I, as a student and citizen of the American republic, grew nauseous for it appeared to me that ALC either did not think that the Student Senate would disagree or worse yet, they did not care... I smell an oligarchy around here somewhere and that really scares me.

So, no answers to question number one, but to question number two about the Student Senate, it seems is evident that the Senate will only have the power that ALC and the administration deem fit to give it. But there is hope, a united student body is a hard thing to ignore, so if you are tired of being asked your opinion only to have it tossed aside, unite and give your Senate the power it (and you) deserve.

Festivities dazzle on campus

by Jennifer Raper

The Fourth Annual Dogwood Day, in conjunction with the Dogwood Arts Festival, was celebrated on Maryville College campus Saturday, April 21.

Celebrating our British and Scottish heritage, the festivities included a plethora of activities, and students as well as faculty, staff, and members of the community attended.

Numerous events, games, and food services were presented on Saturday. The earliest event, which took place from 8 am to 12 pm, was the Carnegie Yard Sale. From 10 until 11, Earth Day revisited will occur.

GAMES and PRIZES! At various locations across campus, different contests were held, including the Highland games of Sheaf Toss and Stone Throw. One of the main competitions, however, gave monetary rewards for the first three placers. Sponsored by the Rotary Club, the Hole in One Contest offered $25 for the third place winner, $50 for the second, and $100 for the first place contestant.

Last year's winner, a Maryville College student, was Be Moua. Everyone was encouraged to test his golfing abilities and attempt to hit a hole in one on the front lawn between 9 am and 4 pm. Also, people dressed in traditional white clothes for the Croquet Contest at the practice football field beginning at 9 and lasting until 11.

Visiting parents and students were urged to organize teams for the Field Games held behind Lloyd between 12:30 and 4:30. However, pre-organized teams were not mandatory for participation.

FOOD! Dogwood Day would not be complete without glorious food. Celebrating our heritage, Highland's British Shop of Pigeon Forge featured traditional British foods, such as scones, meat pastries, and, of course, tea. The food service provided a fish and chips lunch on the grounds of Pearson's patio area.

ENTERTAINMENT! At 12 pm and again at 2 pm, the Foot-hills Theatre Company performed Highland songs and stories on the steps of Thaw Hall.

Between 9 am and 3 pm, one may have ventured into the parking lot next to Fayerweather and Thaw in order to admire the classic British automobiles belonging to the members of the British Car Club of Blount County.

Other forms of entertainment included bagpipe music, and the Maryville College Playhouse Production presented "The Rimers of Eldritch" at 8:15 pm.

Additional activities took place on Saturday, including the Parents' Weekend Reception at Willard House and the Academic Awards Banquet.

Responsible for the festivities of Dogwood Day was Lew Rudisill, who anticipated a big success on Saturday. According to Mrs. Rudisill, Dogwood Day is "our day to celebrate the Dogwood Festival. A way to do that is to celebrate our heritage."

Cram... cram... crunch... COMPS!

You see the worn and weary seniors, eyes bloodshot and baggy, hands gnarled from hours of writing, shoulders slumped from fatigue, and you swear this summer I will...next semester I'll save my notes...I'll be ready...

This naive optimism continues until one day, after four or more years of fun, stressless college life, the sun dissipates, the mountains quiver in fear and this dark shadow hovers over you and every other senior.

Then these distinguished students disappear.

An unknowing freshman question elders only to be answered with a brusque whisper: "they're studying." The mere doom in the elder's voice silences the innocent inquiry.

Finally, the panicked half-witted waif finds a compassionate soul who explains that the seniors, his idols, have disappeared to this special place called "Cram Heaven," as they prepare for this ritual more hideous than reading the Bushing manual, more painful than the ancient Indian tortures, the dreaded..COMPS.

Short for comprehensive exams, this mind-altering madness is the faculty's one last opportunity to test the scholars (supposedly) increased knowledge before departing these hallowed halls. Or, as in some cases, their opportunity to have an evil chortle as a poor un-mastered senior hurtles back to the depths of college life after failing to quench the guru of grades' hunger for all the information covered in all, repeat all, of the major courses.

There is no relief, no escape, no hope, save transferring to another school. There are no exceptions. You will be tested whether you have had the class or not.

And the scars never heal. The hands ease their cramped condition; the eyes return to their natural state. But the brain can only endure so much strain.

Years from now you will join the other seniors who, trying to use the crammed information, scream at the television saying, "Alex, who is Dopey?"

TC talks: Senate flexes new muscle

by Travis Crabtree

Things are looking favorable for the future of the Student Senate. Finally, the senate has some power to effect and benefit its constituents, the student body.

The occasion for celebration was the last senate meeting. The senate was finally its right duty of deciding which student organizations would receive funding from the Student Activity fee, and how much funding each group would receive.

Understandably, it was assumed each group would be represented at the meeting to defend and justify their proposed budget; however, one group was not present.

The senate was faced with a challenging crisis: should they pass the budget with no form of justification or communication from this group, or should they stick to their guns and not allocate the requested increase in the budget for this irresponsible group?

Thank God, the senate stuck to its guns, well.

CRABTREE

flexed its new found muscle, and denied the group the increase. Simply put, there can be no respect for leniency, and the senate desperately needed to garner respect in its initial exercise of its power.

The senate was understandably perplexed, but it did not shirk the power and responsibility that it had worked so long to accumulate. It would have been a very bad precedent if, after being presented with its first dilemma, the senate had decided not to exercise its prerogative to cut funding for groups that are deemed irresponsible.

Once the power had not been exercised, future uses of that power would diminish, until finally no real power would rest on the senate capable shoulders.

Now that the senate has proven it is not an organization to take lightly and that its theoretical power can be manifested, the possibility for future expansion of senate power grows.

Breathe easy, you are being represented well.

Blarney stone blasts back

In the March issue article "Blast My Blarney Stone," the author Tim Lister tried to make St. Patrick's Day seem like just another day, while making cuts against people who celebrated it. Well, myself being a proud Irishman found this hard to swallow.

I am used to celebrating St. Patrick's Day, and this year I decided to go down to Savannah, Georgia, host of the second largest St. Patrick's Day party in the U.S.

While walking around the streets, who do you think was the first person I ran into? That's right! Tim Lister came strolling down the cobblestone street grinning, laughing, looking like a leprechaun, and drinking something other than Kool-Aid out of a green mug.

Now this may not seem like any big deal to most people, but for a full-blooded Irishman, this is blasphemy. As for Tim Lister, he seems very unsure of his feelings! I guess he's just a hypocrite.

Don't let this happen again,

Patrick Hagerty

Student defends policy

Dear Editor,

I've been hearing a lot of uproar about the alcohol policy. Quite frankly I think the students need to grow up and become responsible. I'm tired of hearing the campus blame the policy for the results of irresponsible people. The law states if you are not 21 you can't drink. People should think about what they are asking for. Yeah, the school's going to say to all the students, "Go ahead and drink. We'll cover for you. It doesn't matter if it's illegal and your parents wouldn't approve. After all we are more powerful than the government and the laws of the country don't apply to us or you for that matter." Yeah, I can see this happening real soon. But isn't that what you are asking for. Think about it.

Everybody is complaining but when there was an alcohol forum not even ten people showed up. I've heard students blame the administration and the policy for Bill Knight's accident, this is clearly not the case. The fact is Bill was irresponsible and he made a stupid choice. From what I've read in the Echo it appears as though the writers expected the college to change the policy to allow students to be irresponsible without consequences. This college, as with any college or university, is not obligated to protect students from reality or the consequences thereof. To do so would be legally as well as morally and ethically wrong. You aren't here to learn how to be irresponsible and it wouldn't be right to allow the students to believe that the laws don't apply to them.

Reading the poll on MC's alcohol habits was very depressing because it indicates that there is a significant problem with alcohol use among the student body. It seems that the general belief of most students is that in order to have fun you have to not only drink but drink to excess. That's stupid and irresponsible. Even when you drink you are still responsible for your actions. Being drunk is not an excuse for fights and all the other stupid things that people do. I've heard people talk as though fighting is normal when people drink and no one should get upset when it happens. Bull! The Mike Rhodes concert was a disgrace.

Don't get me wrong, I realize that the students are going to drink. The fact of the matter is that if you are responsible and think about what you're doing, the policy is unenforceable anyway. If you're drinking responsibly no one will know and if they don't know then they can't stop you. If all you want is to drink, have fun, and be responsible then what are you complaining about? You're not just asking to be allowed to drink you're asking the college to prevent the natural consequences of irresponsible behavior and provide a place where the laws of this country do not apply. This request is indeed absurd. You want to be able to be irresponsible and make a big mess and then have the college come in like your mother and clean it up for you, but don't want the college to be able to do what your mother would and put you on restriction. This is what you want you just won't say it.

Sincerely,

Kevin Sumner

(Editor's note: For clarification the article mentioned above ("Despite Knight accident, alcohol policy stands") was neither for or against a policy amendment; it stated only that it would not change.

However, although this letter is correct in urging responsible drinking--questions arise about the administration's role in this process.

First, does it seem possible that a somewhat relaxed, but legal, policy would reduce drunk driving? And second, our administration and often our society refuses to acknowledge alcohol consumption altogether. Instead of teaching moderation and responsible consumption, as this author encourages, they favor abstinence. How do students learn, then, moderation?

Editor bids farewell

by Jana Dalton

So, to the point. I am honored to have held editorship of the Highland Echo. I am proud of the staff members and their willingness to push the Echo to greater heights. I owe a great deal of thanks to each of them for their special contributions.

I also salute Dr. Leonard Butts for his incredible dedication to the reviving the whimpering Maryville College student publications. He has made immeasurable improvements and continues to do so, despite the opposition he constantly faces with budget restraints. Long live "LB."

We cannot claim perfection. But we can claim to have made a stand. We wanted to speak and be heard.

I asked a friend of mine about the most recent issue of the Echo. His response was an interesting one and one that seemed to summarize the efforts of this past year.

He said the Echo in general was one more way of "prodding the sleeping lion."

He added that we, as a student body, had to continue to poke and prod this sleeping lion until it finally rouses its feet once again.

The sleeping lion is obviously the administration, or select parts thereof. For it is these select parts that would have us ignorant to the blunders, misjudgments, and cover-ups happening on campus.

It is these select parts that would stifle our wide-eyed "Whys?"

It is these few who strangle the efforts of our superior professors with red tape until they too bend to conformed silence.

It is my greatest hope that the audience of the Highland Echo from the students to alumni, recognizes the intent of this year's newspaper stemmed from the need for a campus voice.

Congratulations Staff! May the lion never sleep again.

Senior Spotlights:

Tomlin excels in all areas

by Kathleen McArthur

Over the last four years at MC, one certain face has been seen at all kinds of activities and involved in many campus organizations. While most of us are not able to find time to finish assigned class work, this person has managed to do it all. Jan Tomlin, president of Student Senate and graduating senior, has been recognized by staff, faculty, and peers as one of the most accomplished members of the class of 1990.

Tomlin came to the college in the fall of 1986 from Nashville, TN. and will return home definitely leaving her mark on our campus. Some of her achievements and honors include: Alpha Lambda Delta Honor Society, Residence Hall Council Vice President, Residence Hall Judicial Board Chairman, Student Senate, Outstanding College Students of America, Who's Who Among American College Students, Presidential Scholar Distinguished Scholar and Dean's List for four years, Maryville College Scholar Athlete, Jr. Varsity Cheerleader Captain, Varsity Cheerleader Captain, and Alpha Gamma Sigma Honor Society.

At this year's Academic Awards Banquet, Tomlin was recognized as a finalist for Outstanding Senior. She also received the Senior Presidential Scholar Award and Alpha Lambda Delta Highest Grade Point Average Award.

Under the pressure of academic demands, it would seem that Tomlin could have no other outside interests. This perception, however, is not at all true. For the last few summers, she has been very involved in youth camp programs in Nashville as a responds, "I guess it would have to be racing Will Delaney on foot in the Foothills Parkway at midnight. I had a ten-yard lead, and it took no time for him to catch up with me!"

Tomlin also remembers one night her sophomore year; "We (the others will remain anonymous) had been 'socializing' and decided to check out the view of Maryville from the roof of Carnegie. It is very far from the ground and very dangerous, but the sight was great. You can just take my word for it!"

Tomlin has been faced with a lot of new challenges this year as president of Student Senate. She states, "We have a very young group. Only two senators returned from last year, and out of the remaining 14, six are freshmen. We all had a lot to learn, and have made definite progress since the fall. Senate has been given real responsibilities from the faculty and board of directors, it shows that they have a great deal of faith in the students of Maryville College."

The size of the college and sense of community has always been an attractive quality to Tomlin. She remarks, "With the rage of computers, videos, and even

Allison carries on family pride

by Chris Varner

On the evening of April 21 at the MC Awards Banquet, Jon Allison was awarded the "Senior of the Year" citation. This was the culmination of a long string of achievements that Allison has put together in his four years at Maryville College. The community-minded senior, though, is merely continuing a tradition of family excellence.

His sophomore year, he was both an SA and an RA in Lloyd Hall. He also participated in various forms of drama on campus, playing the Stage Manager in Thornton Wilder's "Our Town" and joining Playmakers. Still involved in campus governance, he was named to the Alcohol Policy Task Force.

In his junior year he served as here, because I've done so much and dealt with so many good people that it's very difficult to single out individual people and experiences."

Others seem to have better luck in recalling some of Allison's higher (and lower) moments. Academic V.P. Dean Boldon, upon presenting Jon with the award, mentioned a certain Maryville College "bus Instructor, Lifeguard, Lifeguard Instructor, Standard First Aid Instructor, Community CPR Instructor, Basic Life Support for the Professional Rescuer Instructor, and participant in the Fundamentals of Canoeing.

When asked about one of the funniest experiences she had in college, Tomlin happen overnight, but the fundamental nature of people needing people will bring about that change."

Tomlin will graduate in December after student teaching at Alcoa Elementary School. She will receive a Bachelor of Arts in Elementary Education.

Where will they be 10 years from now?

Knowing the prestige that accompanies the Maryville College degree, we decided to consult a soothsayer (who will remain anonymous). Here are the predictions that issued from this wise one's crystal ball:

Mark Koerber will become the new Art Bushing of MC

Craig Canevit will write Marvel comic books and work at B.K. to support his education habit

John Rhoades will be the Speaker of the House escorted by his fifth wife

Robin Schwall will co-anchor the first father-daughter newscast -NEPOTISM hits TV-land

Julie Costner will be Earth Mother for a new religious cult (strangely associated will ritual tie-dye)

Julie Mulhaney will move to Florida to finally thaw out

Jana Dalton will still be trying to correct all the typos in the Highland Echo

Pam Gunter will finish her I.S.

Chuck Meek will be a GQ sanitation worker in Mexico City

Eric Edmunson will be the next MC alum to manage the "Library"

Amy Zickefoos will be possessed by the ghost of Patsi Cline and become a famous country music singer

Andy Kenyon will discover his real hair color (it was Clairol #9)

Rae Ann Hickman will face her ultimate destiny and pose topless in Playboy

Missy Barker will buy the Houston Astros and will extend Nolan Ryan's career by teaching him how to throw the incredible curve

Brett Stanley will be modeling Jockey underwear for G.Q.

Jon Allison will lose his senatorial seat because of an arson scandal

Jan Tomlin will return to MC as the director of MC Alumni Relations

Jimmy Simerly will design a new luxury car that is ten feet longer than a cadillac

Ken Barber will hijack a Delta jetliner and fly to the Bahamas

Staci Ames will receive the 'Miss Congeniality' award of her office knitting circle

Becky Shackelford will start a massage parlor chain called the "Love Shacks"

Vicki Cornwell will become a Laker girl/Dallas Cowboy cheerleader

Cindy Ashmore will be featured on the cover of Cosmopolitan as the woman who really could do it all

Paul Beasley will return to MC and take over as director of the Highlander Band and become another 'intoxicating' addition to the music department

Amy Jackson after being impeached from her mayoral position will retire to Key West and set up a stand selling sun tan oil, granola bars, and hand-made jewelry

Rocky Casteel will star in "Rocky 15: Tee Me Up Adrian" as the only golfer to take PGA to the PGA

Karen Schubert Metcalf will finally say the word s*#t more serious. "I was fortunate enough to have a strong family tradition in front of me here. It's very hard to explain. Family means a lot to me. My father, an uncle, and both older brothers attended Maryville, yet there was never any pressure from them to attend MC. I made the decision, and now I've grown to have the same respect for MC that I have for my family," Allison said.

The Allison legacy was furthered by Jon's presence on campus. The East Palestine, Ohio, native arrived in the fall of 1986. In his freshman year, he became heavily involved in Student Programming, was inducted into Alpha Lambda Delta, and served on Student Senate, among other activities.

followed that by being named the first MC exchange student to attend Yonsei University in the fall of his senior year, assumed the post of Senate Budgetary Officer upon his return to MC in the spring (and completed the process that he began of giving control of half the student activity fee to senate to allocate to various campus organizations and activities), and was selected to join Alpha Gamma Sigma.

He also worked with the Model United Nations program for four years, and he rounded out his participation in that program by serving as Secretary-General this past winter.

When asked to reflect upon his stay at MC, the 23-year-old Allison hesitated and then said, "It's hard to talk about my time van under the motel's second story overhang on a corner, leaving permanent scars on the motel that still to this day mark the site as "Allison Corner." When reminded of this debacle, Jon laughed and said, "That's probably the greatest disservice I've ever done to the school. I half-assed the job; we should have left it there and shot it."

Allison plans to attend Case Western Reserve Law School (located in Cleveland, Ohio) in the fall to pursue his J.D. In reference to his stay at Maryville, Jon had this to say, "It's time for me to leave. I've done what I hope are perceived to be good things around here; now, it's time to move on and give others their chance."

Opportunities await Stanley

by Tim Lister

Senior Brett 'Prep' Stanley is a man of many talents whose future may take him to a number of places.

Brett is a Physical Education major with a minor in Journalism.

He is a stalwart on the basketball and baseball teams. As a freshman, Brett received the Freshman of the Year Award in both sports. Most recently he was recognized as Team MVP in basketball at the sports banquet last Wednesday. Other accomplishments of Brett's include writing for the school paper as an underclassman.

Brett said that Maryville has done a lot for him in that it has helped him to slow down. He did not know what to expect from a little place like Maryville since he lives in Atlanta. His parents were happy to learn that there was less partying here than Brett expected, and they told him it would give him more time to study. Brett said, "That's not what I wanted to hear, but I adjusted to it and made the best of it."

STANLEY

Brett's fondest memories of Maryville come from parties given by the school and taking athletic road trips. He mainly enjoyed staying in the dorms and "just hanging out with the fellas."

Brett's plans for the future are diverse. He is thinking about returning to Atlanta as a sportswriter or a sportscaster. He also has the opportunity to try out for a semi-pro league in basketball. If all else fails, Brett can also rely on his skills as a drummer, coach, sports official, or even a barber.

Brett leaves Maryville with these words of wisdom, "If you put your mind to it, you can do it."

MC students awarded for academic and athletic achievements

by Christen Anderson

Eight outstanding members of the senior class were recently inducted into the Alpha Gamma Sigma National Honor Society. Jan Tomlin, Jonathan Allison, Neal Atchley, Cynthia Ashmore Fuller, Karen Schubert Metcalf, Whitney Sloan, Joan Rhoades, and Craig Canevit were selected by faculty members for membership in the society.

The academic honor society consists of the top 10% of the graduating class. Students must have a minimum of a 3.3 grade point average to be eligible for the society. The seniors that were inducted into the Alpha Gamma Sigma Society for 1990 did not have below a 3.8 grade point average.

The eight seniors were inducted into the society on April 3 and were recently recognized at the Academic Awards Banquet held April 28.

Jan Tomlin, an Elementary Education major, plans to student teach at Alcoa Elementary School next fall. Following her student teaching stint, she will either begin teaching full time or attend graduate school. Tomlin cited the people at MC as the most memorable aspect of her college years. "I've really enjoyed socializing and meeting new people," she explained.

Political science major Jon Allison recognized his community of friends as the aspect of MC that he will remember the most. "My most important accomplishment during college was being a part of the search committee that selected Marriott as our food service," Allison said.

Allison will be attending law school at Case Western Reserve University next fall. Neal Atchley is a chemistry major who will be attending UT medical school in the fall. He cited his desire to go to medical school as the most motivating factor in his academic career at MC.

"I'll remember the people I met during college the most," Atchley said.

Cindy Ashmore Fuller plans to student teach at Alcoa next semester, and then go on to either graduate or law school. Last year's recipient of the Alpha Gamma Sigma Scholarship, Fuller cited her long term career goals as her most motivating factor as a student.

"My biggest accomplishment at MC has been working 30 hours a week, going to school, and maintaining a 4.0 grade point average," Fuller said.

Karen Schubert Metcalf said she was very proud to be a member of Alpha Gamma Sigma, and to be in the top 10% of her class. A double major in art and psychology, Metcalf said learning has been the most important aspect of her college career.

"One of the most important memories I have about MC is meeting my husband and getting married," Metcalf said. "I also have many cultural and academic memories."

Metcalf plans to get a job as an activities director at either a mental institution or a senior citizens home following graduation.

An elementary education major, Whitney Sloan plans to student teach or attend graduate school at UT next fall. She cited her elementary education classes, working with children, and the professors as the most enjoyable factors of her time at MC.

"Becoming a member of Alpha Gamma Sigma is a great honor," said Sloan.

John Rhoades will be attending graduate school at Purdue University after graduation. At Purdue, Rhoades will be responsible for instructing a freshman composition class and will also take three graduate courses.

"Besides my academics, I think my involvement with the Academic Life Council was an important portion of my time at MC," Rhoades said. "Through it I feel that I've contributed to shaping the academic future of the school."

English major Craig Canevit stated that he was very impressed with the idea of becoming a member of Alpha Gamma Sigma.

"If I could go to college free, I'd go for the rest of my life," Canevit said. "I guess it's a genuine love of learning."

Canevit plans to work for one year following graduation, and then go to graduate school.

Kathleen Anderson, a rising junior, also became a member of the Alpha Gamma Society by receiving the society's scholarship award.

Ferrin says future looks bright...

by Jeff Huffman

What new things can returning students expect to see when they come back to Maryville College? President Ferrin gave his predictions.

There will be new faculty - nine people in all. They will fill positions in the departments of English, Biology, Economics, Sociology, Computer Science, Education, Physical Education, Psychology, and Music.

Next semester's Community Forum program will discuss "African Roots." Alex Haley, author of Roots may speak during the CIV program. Ferrin said "He [Haley] said 'I want to come and speak at Maryville College.'"

A new student programming board will be established along with a new director of student activities. Ferrin hopes that these additions will put in place a strong program of activities for students.

Several new academic programs such as a Major in Sign Language Interpretation, a physics teaching licensure, a revamped teacher program, and possibly an international job exchange.

"I really think that a liberal arts college [that] is worth its salt in the 1990's needs to be pretty aggressive about international understanding - not only having students going overseas but having people from other countries come in here," Ferrin commented.

The class schedule will be different; it will provide for more classes needed for the expected increase in next year's enrollment.

Student Publications will have new computer equipment which will provide for easier production of the Chilhowean, Highland Echo, and Impressions.

The only other improvement or change Ferrin could cite was that the leaky roofs in the residence halls will be fixed.

Student says we gotta wear shades

by John Worth

Well, the summer is almost upon us fellow students, and we all know what that means: preparing for the fall semester, right?

I'm sure.

But, seriously, you as the student should consider it. For you freshmen, the experience of a fall semester will still be strange still, and you will never get used to it. Never. For the duration of your college career there will be certain problems that will never cease to exist. Some things will plague you when you are seniors as much if not more than when you are freshmen. I, the writer of this brilliant piece of journalism, will now relate to you a few of these problems.

Financial Aid Office: This brings back nightmares to people on this campus. Dan Perkins and company have done their share of little boo-boos that have left some people in dire need of money. Guaranteed that if he hasn't gotten you yet, sometime in the future he will. The longer the wait, the bigger the disaster. Go over everything carefully where this department is concerned.

New Faces: Another cause of terror. For every person who has been rejected and dejected by members of the opposite sex, if not every member of the gender, more people will be back next year to cause more sleepless nights, whatever the reason, and more Saturdays spent with you, the closet, and a good magazine.

Teachers: For those teachers who are not returning, good move, I'm sure. For those still here, get out while you can. It is a highly probable fact that if there is a teacher you do not want, you will get him/her next semester, or the teacher you wanted will turn into a demon possessed creature who desires nothing but to give you homework. It is as inevitable as death. Some classes will seem worse. Speaking of which....

Classes: These are the things that are inevitable. I know, you would like to come back and not go. Some people do so anyway, but that is beside the point. Or is it? In case some of you have not heard, classes will resume as scheduled next semester. It is a shame, I know, to think that the terrible college administrators will be making us take those little mini-Hells, but it is what you pay for, and pay you do.

Lack of money: Most people will work over the summer and try to make a little spare change for the school year. But don't even try, because it won't last past the first month of parties and other "social events".

Some people will have these problems, some won't. Some people think I am stupid at this point, if they even made it to this point. But it is certain that a lot of people can identify with these problems. As for the seniors, you can look forward to a beast called the world, and you will have to face it soon, if you haven't already. Be careful over the summer, and don't be wasteful of your time. In three months you will be breaking open the books again, and reuniting with your friends, who have become your family over the past year, and no matter how much you miss your home, you will soon discover that you will miss this place. You will miss the lack of constant water temperature, lack of a bathtubs, lack of good food; but you will, more than anything, miss the abundance of friendship.

MARYVILLE COLLEGE

VOL. 1, NO. 1

Prominent speakers help Maryville College begin new year and kick off the World Series

by Jeff Huffman
Echo Associate Editor

Best-selling author Alex Haley came to the Maryville College Campus to discuss African roots, his career, and the history of the civil rights movement of America.

In the first of the Community Forum lectures concerning African heritage, Haley spoke to the largest Community Forum audience ever assembled in Wilson Chapel.

Haley discussed how he created his best-seller, Roots, and aspects of the television series. He included insights into a life long gone.

Haley learned of his ancestry through his grandmother and her sisters in stories which they would tell every summer during his childhood.

Haley, remembering the stories, happened upon the National Archives in Washington, D.C. He traced his relatives back into 1870 at first - and was "bitten" by the geneology bug. "Once you're bitten, you can never stop," Haley said about his life-long hobby.

Haley dropped out of school and became a member of the U.S. Coast Guard. It was in the Coast Guard he first realized he could become a writer. He became a sort of Cyrano De Bergerac, helping fellow sailors write eloquently to their girlfriends back home.

After 20 years in the Coast Guard, Haley became engrossed in his family history and writing. After All colleges and universities have a very distinct ceremony to officially begin the academic year. Maryville College begins each year with convocation, a blend of academic tradition and relaxed familiarity unique to the college.

The audience was greeted by an enthusiastic organ prelude by Dr. James Bloy, then treated to the academic procession of the faculty, a tradition that thoroughly speaks of the liberal arts.

This year's ceremony began with president Richard Ferrin's welcoming new and returning students and alumni to the new academic year; his was the definition of a welcoming address.

The new senate president, Chris Varner, then declared the intent of the college, and Dr. Daniel Taddie and Dr. Robert Bonham celebrated the purpose in musical tribute to the college.

The ceremony then spotlighted on Dr. Bae-ho Hahn, a prominent international political scientist and Maryville College graduate.

His speech focused on "Christian commitment relevant to secular learning." He called on science and scholarship to aid in bridging the gap between the rich and the poor, to prevent further ecological devas-

Support the new Echo

The joke is finally over. The joke, better known as the Highland Echo, was quite funny for awhile, but even last year, the comical light surrounding the paper was dimming.

Now a new light shines upon the paper, and the source of that light is something that might surprise a few administrators, faculty, and most of all, the entire student body--substance.

This year, thanks to an alumni gift and support of our budget by the Student Senate, the Echo staff finally has the materials necessary to produce for the students a paper worthy of its 11,000 dollar price tag.

The Echo will cover subjects that you want to know, subjects that you need to know, campus politics, the hopeful resurgence of social life, athletic events of interest, and other special surprises that we hope you will enjoy.

Yes, we are ambitious; we are optimistic, but realistically, this is only the first edition of the paper. This tide of invigoration we feel now may ebb later in the year.

And that is where you, the Echo reader, comes in. Your task in upgrading the Echo into a formidable campus voice is interaction.

Let us know if we fall short of expectations, fail to cover areas of interest, or just plain miss the mark.

Last year, you did this through letters to the editor. This year, we hope that the letters will continue to come, but we will also be asking for feedback in other ways, such as in campus polls.

The paper certainly has potential, yet without the student body, we are nothing. Help us give you the paper you deserve as an MC student.

"... a reminder about three of the liberal arts. In the early formulations, there were seven liberal arts. The first three were grammar, rhetoric, and logic. These were called the trivium."

"There are institutions of higher learning throughout our country where technical and applied subjects are studied and the trivium neglected."

"...we pursue the liberal arts, even the trivium..."

"...we pursue those arts even though they do not appear as course titles in the catalog."

"...we begin the academic year committed to our own version of trivial pursuit."

-excerpts from Dr. Boldon's convocation speech

Editor's note:

The Echo has the same desires as Dr. Boldon and will strive to inform the students about the state of academics at MC.

What's new, what's better

by Dr. Dean Boldon
Academic Vice-President

The editor asked me to outline some of the things that will be happening in the academic program this year. I expect that the first thing students will notice is the presence of seven new full-time faculty members and several new part-time teachers.

We will have better faculty coverage in areas like economics, sociology, English, and sign language, and we have brought in much-needed expertise in molecular biology, secondary education, computer science, and choral music.

An interesting change in the foreign language program is that language drill instructors are all MC students. We use the drill method rather than language labs, and our drill instructors are all either native speakers or advanced language students.

There is a lot of research evidence that suggests that peer tutoring is a very effective approach to learning. We have found that MC students are generally more dedicated to the job than outsiders, and we expect this new approach to be very effective.

I am pleased to announce that Dr. Glenn Hewitt, Assistant Professor of Religion and Philosophy, has been appointed Associate Dean in the academic area. He will have various administrative duties, though he will continue to teach several courses including Humanities 390.

The Academic Life Council will continue its examination of comprehensive exams this year. The effort will be to ensure parity, fairness, and rigor in comps across all departments.

I have asked the Interim Committee to examine the program and try to develop some better approaches to the experimental learning we hope to see in the Interim.

The Registrar's Office is now computerized, and (if we all survive the change-over) there should be several things we can do more efficiently.

Also, the new catalog reflects a great many changes in our major programs, with the new teacher education program being the most radically changed.

Finally, I might echo some things I said at the opening convocation. We are a liberal arts college, and I hope we maintain a strong sense of that identity.

Like colleges everywhere, MC is subject to many pressures to be something other than a community dedicated to broad-based learning.

Some envision a business or technical school; others imagine a personal improvement institute, and still others think of any college as mainly a sports center.

We do a bit of all those worthwhile things, but there are better places to pursue those narrow goals. Our mission is broader, and I hope we stay with the complicated task of keeping it that way.

Programming wants input

by Leslie Nier
Director of Campus Life

The new Student Programming Board begins its inaugural year as a direct result of a group of concerned students who constructively expressed their dissatisfaction with the amount and type of programming that was being offered on campus.

The decided to put together a proposal for a programming board which would recognize all classes, residence halls, and commuters. They submitted their proposal to the student Senate and won unanimous approval on the first go around. Elections were held in the spring and several of the board positions were filled at that time.

Setting up a system that provided for input from all classes, resident halls, and commuters seemed the best way to go. It seemed logical that is exactly how programming should work on a college campus.

For many years the job of deciding what, how, when, and where to program was left, by default, to one or two students and an administrator at the Student Development

Office. While efforts were made to solicit ideas from the student body at large, no one seemed interested or willing to put out the effort. Who knows better what students want to do than students?

In order for the Programming Board to do its best job this year, there must be ideas and enthusiasm generated from among the student body. Even the most creative programming board does not have the corner on ideas. Input and participation are essential to the success of any programming committee.

While the programming board IS responsible for providing activities and fun things to do, they are NOT responsible for teaching students how to enjoy themselves in a constructive way.

Sometimes it is really frustrating when a group of students put alot of time and energy into a program, only for six to eight people to attend. It is kind of like practicing your heart out in preparation for a game, concert, or play

It takes effort and courage to attend an activity, dance, concert, or forum when you have never done it before.

Pounders powers MC activities

by Travis Crabtree

Phi Mu! Gesundheit.

Yes, it is true that MC students are not accustomed to many Greek letters or phrases, but with the arrival of Cathy

But think about it, what do you have to lose? Maybe a little time, but time is always wasted on something. Something new could be fun and you might just meet that special someone.

College is supposed to be a learning experience; however, learning does not occur only in the classroom. Get out there and support your new Programming Board, and learn something about yourself and also the people you see in class everyday. You just might have fun, and that would not be a waste of time!

Pounders, that and much more changed.

Pounders, a recent graduate of UTK and a Phi Mu sorority sister, is the new Student Activities Coordinator and Resident Director of Lloyd Dorm.

When quizzed on the infamous Maryville College apathy that so beleaguered her predecessors, she said she has yet to witness anything which could be labelled apathetic.

"The people I am working with do not seem apathetic," she also defended.

Moreover, she could not find one thing about the college that does or even might make her unhappy.

"Everyone here has been 'pretty friendly' so far," she commented.

And why not? She sees many "opportunities and variety" awaiting everyone at MC this year.

"The students are a lot closer at Maryville College and more aware of what is going on. Everyone at UT is unconcerned," she said.

The resume she brings with her attests for her enthusiasm.

She has held offices in her sorority. She served as a member of the Vol Corps, a group committed to recruiting new students to the university. She also served on the Traffic Appeals Board and was an RA for one and a half years.

She came to the college because of the appeal of the small school ambience, the opportunity to help people get out and do things, and because Leslie Nier called her about the job.

Echo wishes MC luck

Great are the worries and small are the rewards of student programmers at Maryville College; however, with the tremendous amount of freshmen and transfers, the until-now apoplectic MC social life could stop gagging and coughing and actually start beating strong from all the new blood on campus.

A new person, Cathy Pounders, fresh from UT (one of the last bastions of full-fledged Southern hedonism) is now on campus with desires to import some of the UT social enthusiasm and know-how.

But the task is a momentous one. Each new class is looked upon as MC's social savior, and all the previous classes (the now suspiciously revered upperclassmen) have done little to improve our sad lot.

So, now the task of resuscitating campus life falls to the new class of freshmen, transfers, and Cathy Pounders.

The Echo wishes you luck.

Student Senate looks for success in the new year

by Chris Varner
Student Senate President

Student Senate '90-'91 is about to get rolling. Elections were held on September 25 to fill the last vacancies, namely the two freshman representatives and the two commuter representatives.

Before I get ahead of myself, though, I would like to first explain what Senate is and then the purpose of this column.

Student Senate is a five-year-old organization that serves to represent students on the campus in their dealings with faculty, staff, administration, and other students.

The way in which Senate responds to this task is to monitor the activities of committees on campus set up to deal with specific aspects of the college's day-to-day func-

DAVE'S WORLD

by David Roberts
Echo Columnist

As I talked on the phone with my dad the other day, I brought up the idea of writing a column for the newspaper.

He said, "For a college paper? To college students? They wouldn't read it; they're just a bunch of beer-swilling, belching, poorly dressed, lazy, hormone-infested college students!"

Naturally, I defended my classmates. "Who are you calling poorly dressed?"

Anyway, despite my father's misgivings, I decided to give the column thing a go, so I guess introductions are in order.

Howdy. My name is David Roberts, and I'm a freshman. I'm enduring the usual freshman schedule, which I'm sure you are all familiar with.

Some Foreign Language (SFL), Statistics and Other Inconsequential Trivia (SOIT), English (HELL), and an inquiry class. At the end of the semester I will be able to tell you how much I hate my freshman year in perfect Spanish, write for you how much I hate my freshman year in perfect English, compute the probability of quitting my freshman year, and thanks to inquiry, I'll know myself better so I will be fully confident that I hate my freshman year.

I'm majoring in English, believe it or not. Writing to be specific. I plan to do this for a living, so if I stink at it, for God's sake, let me know!

Do you want to let me ruin the rest of my life?!?

I would explain the purpose of this column, really I would, but that would be impossible. It has no purpose. I've always wanted a forum for my inane ramblings, so I figured this was the place to go. What I'm trying to say is, this column will have no set format or subject matter, so you never know what kind of random weirdness is going to turn up here. Most of it will be funny, some of it will be depressing, some of it will be controversial, but hopefully all of it will be worth reading.

Since this column is for you, the MC student, I'd like to hear from you. Not that I'll pay any attention to anything you say, but it will make you feel better, and I'll get a couple of laughs. What I'm trying to say is... WRITE! Write in and tell me about your day. Tell me what bugs you about college life. Tell me what you think about God. Or the situation in the Middle East. Or why you think this column is a stupid idea. Anything. If you are lucky, I will make fun of your letter in the newspaper for everybody to read. Then you will really feel special.

You are probably saying, "Okay, Dave, you want to know what we think, but first, tell us what you think."

Actually, you are probably not saying that, but I need an excuse to start yakking. Here's what I think: I think football is overrated. I think that anyone who wears Air Jordans and does not play basketball should have his feet cut off. I think the NEA should be abolished. I think most rap and all dance music is racist.

Despite glasnost, I think communism is a plague on us all. I think a constitutional ban of flag-burning is the most misguided idea of the last half century (and there have been some doozies).

I think monogamy is fundamentally absurd, and marriage is an out-dated concept. I think that anyone who doesn't bother to recycle a coke can is a contemptable worm. I think that Bart Simpson is a little snit.

I don't hate homosexuals or blacks, and neither does Guns' N' Roses! I think "In God We Trust" should be taken off the dollar bill. I think the fact that the New Kids On The Block are popular says something sad about our society.

I think marijuana should be legalized. I think that the drinking age should be 18 everywhere.

If you passionately disagree (or agree) I've said, write and tell me! If you want to get something off your chest, write and get it off! If you are female and not taken, write and give me your room number.

Don't believe the hype, but don't create it! (That's my catchy sign-off phrase. Like it?) See ya!

Fine Arts Center gets Dot Art

by Heilman Von Muster
Echo Staff Writer

Knoxville watercolor artist Dot Galloway opened the Maryville College Fine Arts Center Gallery season with an exhibit of large, colorful, semi - abstract paintings on September 3.

Galloway's new works are mostly watercolor and gauche but do include several acrylic paintings on canvas. Her current imagery is an abstraction of real life where color dominates the interpretation of nature.

Galloway has received awards for her paintings from many organizations, including the Southern Watercolor Society, the Tennessee Watercolor Society, and the Knoxville Dogwood Arts Festival, to name a few. Her paintings are exhibited in numerous public and private collections, such as those belonging to TVA, the University of Tennessee, First Tennessee Bank, and the Knoxville Museum of Art.

The exhibit runs through September 28. FAC Gallery hours are from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m., Monday through Friday. Special viewing arrangements are made through the MC Fine Arts Department, 981 - 8150.

Anderson computer lab established

by Missy Flaherty
Echo Staff Writer

If you're wondering where to find Dr. Leonard Butts lately, try Anderson Hall room 306, the new PC-compatible computer lab.

The equipment for the lab, as well as equipment for student publications in Fayerweather Hall, was purchased with a generous gift to the Maryville College writing program from Tutt Bradford, former owner and publisher of the Maryville-Alcoa Daily Times, and his wife Elizabeth.

The Anderson lab consists of 15 Tandy 386SX computers with VGA color monitors. These machines are somewhat faster than the 286 computers in the Sutton Science computer lab and are equipped with mice to accommodate new software. The lab also contains three dot matrix printers, a laser printer, and an overhead projector that can be hooked to a computer.

According to Butts, the piece of equipment that has generated the greatest interest so far is the full-page scanner. A scanner operates like a copy machine and can scan any photograph or graphic into a computer where it can be manipulated and stored. The scanner in the Anderson lab also is equipped with optical character recognition (OCR) software, which allows it to recognize and scan text. Scanned text can then be imported into a word processor and edited.

1990-1991 MACCO season is highlighted by much diversity

by Artimus Pyle
Echo Staff Musician

A big band concert by the Artie Shaw Orchestra highlights the 1990 - 91 season of the Maryville - Alcoa - College - Community Orchestra. Paul Theissen enters his third season as the orchestra's artistic director and conductor.

The season kicks off on October 22 with a Piano & Pops concert featuring Sallie Warth Schoen, associate professor of music at Maryville College. Schoen has frequently been a guest artist locally with the Knoxville Symphony and Chamber Orchestras. She is also a well - known recitalist and accompanist.

On December 3, the trumpet shall sound with John Dent, a member of the Cardinal Brass Quintet in New York City. Dent has performed with the Brooklyn Philharmonic, the Queens Symphony, the Cosmopolitan Symphony, the Stamford Chamber Orchestra and in the orchestra for the Broadway production of Cats.

The February 25th winter concert features organist Margie Roberts Johnson. Johnson is currently organist and choirmaster at All Saints Episcopal Church in Morristown, TN. She has appeared as organist and harpsichordist with the Knoxville Symphony Orchestra.

On March 18, the Artie Shaw Orchestra, under the direction of Dick Johnson, will bring back big band sound. Johnson is a multi - instrument virtuoso, playing saxophone, flute, clarinet, and the new electronic lyrcion. Music critics have hailed the orchestra as playing with excitement, energy, and skill, with Johnson mixing the musical styles in a masterly fashion.

The annual Showcase Concert of Area Artists is on April 8, with finalists being selected from auditions held earlier in the season. The concert is part of the Blount County Dogwood Arts Festival.

Wrapping up the season on May 6 is an evening of opera favorites, featuring soprano Kaaren Erickson, heldentenor Edward Sooter and mezzo - soprano Margaret Mann. Erickson has performed with the Metropolitan Opera, and Cincinnati and Knoxville Opera Companies. Her husband, Edward Sooter, has sung extensively with many of Europe's major opera houses, including those of Munich, Cologne, Hanover, Copenhagen, Nice, and Athens, as well as with the Metropolitan Opera in New York. Margaret Mann was the leading soloist with Landestheater in Coburg, West Germany. She has also sung with Lyric Opera of Chicago, the Santa Fe Operah and the Zurich Opera in Switzerland.

All concerts are on Monday evenings at 8:15 p.m. in Wilson Theatre on the Maryville College campus. MC students can get in free with their Maryville College I.D. For more information, call 981 - 8205.

"There is a misconception that scanning text is as easy as using a copy machine," Butts said. "For graphics it is easy, but with text if the scanner doesn't recognize the type font, there is a long and somewhat tedious process that you have to follow in order to teach it to recognize your font. Once you've gone through the process, then it should be able to recognize that font from then on, but it would be faster just to type a document of a page or two into the computer than to try to scan it using OCR."

The latest software, including Wordperfect 5.1, Aldus Pagemaker (a layout and design program), Quattro (a spreadsheet), and FoxBase (a database), is available in the lab.

The biggest difference between the Sutton and Anderson labs, according to Butts, is that the Anderson computers run Windows 3.0, a graphical user interface that allows the user to control software applications with a mouse. Like the Macintosh interface, Windows 3.0 is user friendly and more intuitive for first time computer users. Windows 3.0 also comes with its own word processor, paint program, calculator, and clock. At present, the lab is being used to teach upper division writing classes.

"For the future we would like to somehow generate money to buy additional software that would allow us to update or upgrade the Sutton lab and make the two compatible," Butts said. "Also, it would be nice to have software that would allow us to teach other kinds of classes. Foreign languages, for example."

According to Butts, the new lab is to have three uses: as a teaching facility for courses than can be adapted to computer-assisted instruction (CAI), as a writing lab that would enable self-paced instruction in grammar and mechanics, as an open lab to take the overflow from Sutton.

"So far we have begun to use it only as a teaching facility," Butts said. "To accomplish the other two uses, we need grammar software for tutorial use, and we have to solve problems of compatibility with the Sutton lab and security in Anderson after hours. We're hoping that by next semester, students not in writing classes can have access."

The Anderson lab this semester is open only to students in English 217—copy editing, layout, and design, and to three Inquiry groups studying communications technology. Students who wish to learn word processing should inquire about tutorial sessions given by Dr. John Nichols in the Sutton lab.

But for all computer whizzes and for the few of us who are computer "phobics," the Anderson lab is the lab of the future at Maryville College.

Highland Echo receives collegiate press awards for 1989 - 90 tenure

by Justin Helvetica
Echo Staff Writer

The Highland Echo has been awarded a second class and a third place in two national college newspaper competitions.

The Echo received a second class, out of five classes, in the critiquing service offered by the Associated Collegiate Press Association. The ACP judge called the Echo "nothing short of a miracle," considering the limited budget and lack of equipment with which the paper's staff worked last year.

In the Columbia Scholastic Press Association critiquing service, sponsored by Columbia University, the Echo received a third place out of four places.

The Echo was given high marks by both services' judges for editorial content, coverage of campus and local events, and use of a broad range of sources for stories. The judges agreed that the Echo needs a more consistent format, less commentary and value judgments in news stories, and better photography.

"The value of these awards is in the critiquing," said Dr.

Leonard Butts, Advisor to Student Publications. "It gives us a chance to compare ourselves with other college newspapers of similar size and circulation across the country. It also allows students to have the insights of the experienced journalists and advisors who do the critiquing. If you don't participate in these national services, you can lose perspective," Butts said.

"And it also gives me insight as an advisor."

Butts encourages any student who has experience in writing or photography to take advantage of the opportunity to work for student publications.

"On a resume, no matter what the field, any and all publications are an advantage," he said.

Dr. Scott Brunger discusses African-American roots at Community Forum

by Jeff Huffman
Echo Assistant Editor

Scott Brunger, Instructor of African Studies at Maryville College, spoke on "Our African Roots" in the second of the series of Community Forums dealing with African - American Roots. Brunger brought to light the fact that many assets of our culture can be traced to Africa.

The forum began with a reading of "Brier Rabbit" by Skip Heverly and "Anansi" by Charlotte Borderieux. The stories sounded totally different, but in fact were the same story transformed by time and culture.

Food, language, dance, and education in the United States were also influence by African origins.

Larry Ervin and Ramier Rodriguez carried on a conversation about cowboys - cattle raising was begun in Africa.

Brunger demonstrated some traditional African dance on stage, explaining how people would represent themselves by the way they danced.

After the forum, the cafeteria served peanut butter soup, paprika chicken, and several other foods owing their origins to Africa.

A change in the schedule was announced. Reverend Motlalepula Chabaku will speak on November 15 instead of November 8.

Baseball, coaches, cheerleaders receive worthy coverage

By John Worth
Echo Sports Editor

The baseball program had a shaky start this year, with no coach. Coach Ramsey left the school for monetary reasons. But Brian Wager, the assistant football coach, stepped in to take over the responsibilities.

The team is doing a lot on its own, though, and Wager is tied up with football right now, and he has no assistant coach. But both players and coach are enthusiastic and are willing to work hard. Wager said "the team is well balanced. I'm looking forward to a good season."

What would any sport be without support? And who better to give the support than the cheerleading squad. Although meager (four members) they are trying to be as supportive as possible.

Sports gear up for a new year with enthusiasm

By John Worth
Echo Sports Editor

The M.C. year has resumed, and with it the athletic department is getting geared up for [what is hoped to be] the best seasons ever.

Kandis Schram has a lot to look forward to this year. She is not only the coach for women's volleyball, but also heads the softball team. Both squads have the benefit of returning players - five for softball and eight for volleyball.

The softball team is looking to rebuild this year, with a good mix of old and new players. Schram seemed to have an air of confidence when talking about the spring sport, but says volleyball is her main concern right now.

The volleyball team will have to work hard to best last year's 34 - 3

"We're trying to raise enthusiasm among the students," Junior Sabrina Cefali said. She encourages support of all sports, and wishes a healthy season to all.

Unfortunately, timing and my own adverse schedule prevented an interview with the men's basketball and football coaches. I apologize for this, but I am a busy person. Yet, out of kindness, I will try to make my own predictions.

Both squads are well balanced with a good nucleus of returning players matched with talented freshmen players. Both squads are bent on improving over last year's schedule and, in the case of our slowly improving football team, win a few games. Both coaches are probably very enthusiastic about the upcoming seasons and feel good about their squads.

record, which earned them first in the conference. But, this year's squad is "comparable to last years," Schram said.

When going to the games, look for freshman standouts Jenni McCafferty and Nikki Boop, as well as Leslie Henry and Joni Harper (senior captains) and Tonya DeWitt. "They are an exciting bunch of girls to work with, full of enthusiasm and intensity," Schram said. Let's give these girls well deserved support.

The hot item on campus these days can be found on the soccer fields. The men's team is proving formidable to their opponents. They are a confident group of players who work well together and display confidence on the field. Brian Moore is heading to be leading scorer so far, but he is supported by a strong offense and defense by Ben Sohrabi, midfielder, softball

Scott Snyder (fullback), and a variety of keepers.

Coach Pepe Fernandez is trying to lead his team to the national tournament, but admits the road will be somewhat rough. "We're looking forward to a good year. We will be successful with hard work," Fernandez defeated Agnes Scott 14 - 0, which is a high scoring soccer game. This season will bring back Kelly Smelcer, last years leading scorer, and Kerrie Tarwedoe, the only senior. "We're still young," Coach Jerry Litton said in an interview.

Included in this years schedule will be Emory (no. 13 in nation) and Division I team Vanderbilt. Heavy recruiting over the past two years has started to pay off. "The team is very well balanced," Litton said. "Any loss will be hard fought."

When the M.C. women's basketball team hits the TRSSS(?) Bank Tipoff tournament in Washington, D.C. (November 16 - 18), they will be prepared. The recruiting season yielded many good perimeter players. Most of the freshmen came from winning programs. Four out of five have played in a state tournament. They will include some of the top Division III schools.

What does Coach Wes Moore have to say about the season? "I'm excited about it. Some excellent freshmen players have given us new enthusiasm."

Forum focus on dance

by John Worth
Echo Sports Editor

Community Forums have often been considered tame-even boring-by some. Some people do not go because they think that they are stupid. If you did not go to the Oct. 4 performance of the Knoxville College Dance Group, you were deprived of a strong performance by talented performers.

If you did go, you will probably never forget it.

The performance started out on a sour note. 45 minutes into the scheduled performance, it had not began. Then, as the show started, a baby proved to disrupt any and all attention given to the speaker. But, after a good ten minutes of the wailing, a bottle was placed in its mouth and the attention went back to the show. Unfortunately, no one knew what the speaker had said. But after the music started, no words were necessary.

The first number proved a delight, with some interesting apparel and more interesting dancing. No one will ever forget the large man in the back who had the moves of Fred Sanford and the size of George Foreman. But it was very entertaining and he deserves credit for just being on stage.

And then the second number. It was an inspiring piece. The man's voice was incredible and his monologue touched the heart and surely made everyone think. Not much can be said about the performance, except praise.

"Wherever I Go" by the Winans was the background music for the third number.

The dance was well performed and entertaining, from many aspects. The young lady dancing had grace and poise; she left an impression on the minds of many, different depending on the person.

A rendition of an old gospel song was the next performance. It had all the elements of a southern church: singing, dancing and a lack of caucasians. It showed everyone that there is a severe lack of religious emotion in our modern churches.

"Free Our People in the Mother Land", an anti-apartheid rap, followed the gospel sound to lend a modern touch to the show. It preached a message that was not unfamiliar, but still deserves attention.

A fiery speaker, whose message was derived from KRS-One's (of Boogie Down Productions) recent recordtioning (such as the Food Service Committee, for example, which has four student representatives) and to specifically discuss matters of student concern that have been brought to Senate's attention by students or other interested parties.

This brings me to the point of what this column's intent is. All too often, Senate finds itself operating in a vacuum, unaware of students' feelings on various matters. In the past blame could be equally divided between the students for not seeking out their Senators and expressing their views and the Senate itself for not making more of an effort to get in touch with the students, either by publicizing meetings or approaching

Senate, in past years, actually may not have been in the position to do this, as it was a fledgling organization that was struggling to find its campus identity. It could not make the campus aware of its duties and "mission" because these things had not been clearly defined in the campus context.

The present situation is quite different. Senate is now an active voice in the formation of campus policy. It has a firmly established role with direct ties to both the President of the institution and the Board of Directors. Senate is responsible for allocating half the student activity fee to various organizations on campus, from the Student Programming Board that plans

After the Community Forum, Haley ate in Pearson's Dining Room and later talked for an hour on various topics in the CCM building.

Most questions dealt with Malcolm X, bigotry, and the African - American identity.

most of the campus' activities to the Highland Echo itself.

This is not to say that Senate is now a static organization; nothing could be further from the truth. Even now, new committees are being formed, old ones modified, and new policies formulated. There is, however, no longer an excuse for you the student being uninformed as to what is going on either in Senate itself or on campus in general. Senate meetings are open to whomever wants to attend. The first two in October will be held on the 11th and the 25th at 1:30 in the CCM.

Senate also now has no excuse for not keeping the student body informed as to what issues it is facing. That is the aim of this column-to explain why certain decisions were made (and what they were) and which ones are coming up for consideration. In this way, you, the student body, will be able to voice your ideas before crucial votes are taken. Concerns can either be expressed to Senators prior to meetings or by you yourselves at meetings.

I encourage all of you to sit up and take notice of what is happening on campus around you and to voice your ideas on what you see. My box number is 2606 (not the 2602 that is printed in last year's directory). Let me know what you think. We are accountable to you, the people we serve, but only if you make us so. Please do.

Homecoming: thank goodness, it's over

Homecoming. That special time in the year when sentimentality and gross exaggeration about MC glory is not looked at in disdain. Homecoming. The time for participation and activity by students, parents and alumni. Homecoming. It is over. Good.

Why is it good that it is over? There are many reasons, but the most critical is the same reason that it is good that Earth Day is over.

For 364 days, those who care about the environment toil and sweat to turn their idealism into reality, and then, on that remaining day, Earth Day, everyone seems to have the environment bug nibble on their consciences. But with the chiming of midnight, that bug is swiftly doused with Raid.

The same is the case with Homecoming. For one week, everyone loves MC, the alumni return, the birds sing, and the sun shines on MC. For that week, all is good. Yet, with the removal of all the banners, the spirit and enthusiasm surrounding MC leaves as well.

Those that care about the state of MC, both as an institution of higher learning and as an ever-rusting link to the Southern past, do remain, but are scoffed at for the remainder of the year.

Homecoming is supposed to be a spark that will ignite the tenacity to keep MC on the path that it has travelled for over a century. Yet, the return to the dreary routine is so easy and so many do it, it is difficult if not impossible to avoid.

Students are not the only slaves to routine and the status quo. It is evident on all levels. The entire college seems to be in a fugue, an era of transition to something, but no one seems to know what. The status quo has become the tradition which is revered and homaged.

It must stop. The tradition, the pride, and even the glory of MC can be resurrected if the energy channeled into Homecoming is redirected toward MC over the course of the entire year. All that is required is a little reflection, and little perseverance, and an assessment of what MC should be. Remember, MC will be your alma mater someday.

MC needs to consider "all human voices," including the handicapped

"Maryville College... strives to be an instrument of liberation... to nurture the deep concern for persons that leads to constructive action."

"In an atmosphere of freedom and sensitivity, ...it must listen attentively and humbly to all human voices."

Those are excerpts from the college's statement of purpose, read to all at convocation. To insure credibility in the academic world, it is essential that the college maintain the promises made by the statement.

Take a look around the campus and its facilities. There seems to be a group of people missing. These people are not here for one simple reason: the college could not "liberate" them; instead, the facilities and design of the campus would actually cast them into an academic bondage because of the inaccessibility of the campus.

This group is those with physical impairments. They do not seem to be included in the community of "persons with a variety of interests, backgrounds, beliefs, and nationalities" that the college claims in its statement of purpose.

It is a vicious Catch-22. They are not here, so it is not paramount that the facilities be made accessible to them. Yet without accessibility, none will come.

However, should it be left to a few brave individuals to enroll and force the campus to adjust to them?

It seems more reasonable that the college should make the first move. It should demonstrate the "genuine concern for the world" and make accessible adequate facilities to these potential members of the college community.

Furthermore, the inaccessible spots on campus not only hinder the enrollment of impaired students, it also hurts the present students.

How many times have you seen someone on crutches trying to get to the third floor of Anderson Hall or the second floor of Sutton Science? There are numerous students who have been prevented from getting to class because of a broken or sprained ankle.

It is understandable that in these days of budget cuts and decreased emphasis on higher education that the monies for such renovations are not readily available, but the college states that it should "Strive to build and strengthen the human community."

Ignoring a certain minority can never be viewed as a policy of strength.

The Campus Question...

What do you think of the new class schedule?

"I hate it. I have five classes on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday; and none on Tuesday and Thursday." David King, Sophomore.

"I hate it. It is hard to get coordinated. All my classes are on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday." Janet Gelbach, Junior.

"It is harder because you can't understand the teacher." Yoshiko Hiramatsu, Exchange Student.

"It could be improved. Too many morning classes. I would like morning lab more. I would also like to see more majors." Allison Frost, Sophomore.

"Need to have more classes in the afternoon." Kelly Bloom, Freshman.

"I think it has some big advantages. You can schedule morning classes, or classes every other day so that you can have a job." Lori Chambers, Senior.

"I like it because Tuesdays and Thursdays are easy. This gives me a break during the week." Glen Cullop, Sophomore.

"I like it fine. I like change. I have been thorough five or six changes already." Arthur Bushing, Associate Professor of English.

"I like it. I have a lax day on Tuesdays and Thursdays." Jeff Raymond, Sophomore.

"With a common lunch hour, you always knew where and when to find someone." David Powell, Instructor in English.

"I like it. It is the same as in other schools." Shea Bailey, Sophomore.

"I don't mind. It gives me lots more flexibility to scheduling." Bob Ramger, Associate Professor of Biology.

"I really like the new class schedule. I might have scheduled Drill classes at different times, though." Elizabeth Perez-Reilly, Professor of Spanish.

"It's good. It's divided up so that there is more free time." Patrick Mumpower, Junior.

"On the whole it's pretty good. It provides more class opportunities." Glenn Hewitt, Assistant Professor of Religion and Philosophy.

"It's difficult to schedule lunch-eons for students and prospective employers without a common lunch hour." Jean Jones, Career Planning & Placement.

When will MC learn that the only real future is today ?

by Travis Crabtree, Editor

With the resignation of Carl Pagels, and the reason behind his resignation—this year's enrollment was short of administrative expectations—also comes an important question from presently enrolled students: What about us?

Before that question is fully addressed, however, let us examine the Pagels situation a little closer. If enrollment met or even exceeded -Praise the Lord-expectations, what would MC do with them?

Students here already have to endure some core classes which have about ten percent of the student body in them; sometimes survive a week or two after a test to know their score simply because the class size swamps the instructor in blue books, and suffer in the cafeteria which quite frankly is too small for even present enrollment.

Aside from classes which break student-teacher ratios that are described in all of the MC catalogs that I have seen, where would these people live? Other than pitching tents on Lloyd Beach, I haven't a clue.

And that brings us to our real focus. It seems that MC is so busy planning for the future that it is ignoring the present. Not to say that this is blatant disregard on the part of the administration, but to students already here, to hear about the new Student Center and the revamping of Carnegie makes us feel left out in the cold.

Convocation, a ceremony which celebrates the upcoming year and the MC community of today, even contained a starry eyed gaze into the future. Unfortunately for students, our vision is limited to the four years we will spend here, and with the exception of some of this year's freshmen, all that those at convocation will see is the same-old same-old.

Don't get me wrong, I hold no ill-feelings toward the classes which will pass through after I am gone, but I do feel slightly jealous about all the things being prepared for them.

I am reminded of Scarlet O'Hara's favorite saying, "Oh fiddly-dee, I will think about that tomorrow!" But as Scarlet discovered, just as MC will, tomorrow only comes once today has been dealt with.

Dave's World

There has been a terrible mistake. Through some horrible misprint, the following quote appeared in my last column: "Monogamy is fundamentally absurd, and marriage is an outdated concept." What it was actually supposed to say is this: "Monogamy is fundamentally absolute, and marriage is an outstanding concept." I would never say anything horrible like that. You readers must have thought I was a real jerk. To think that L...

Are you believing this?

Okay, so I put my foot in my mouth. It's not the first time, by any stretch of the imagination, and it won't be the last. In fact, I'll probably do it again in the next 500 or so words. However, I've gotten so much verbal flogging about that quote, I thought I should clarify my exact meaning. In other words, I put my foot in my mouth last column; this column I'm going to swallow it.

A person does not contain a specific quantity of love. It is not something to be doled out like a miser. Why be tight-fisted with love? Why can't I love two women? Why can't a woman I love, love another man? In this sense, I find the concept of monogamy ridiculous.

The idea that a man only finds love once in his life, that only one woman is "right" for him, is merely a flight of adolescent fantasy. I am not, I repeat, not advocating sleeping around, spreading S.T.D.'s, betraying boy/girlfriends, wearing miniskirts, being generally immoral, cruelty to animals, communism, drugs...

I have always thought that marriage is rather pointless. If two people love each other enough to devote their lives to one another, isn't that commitment enough? What is a piece of paper compared to that commitment? Why should two people have to swear to Uncle Sam that they love each other? (My parents have been happily married for 25 years, they love each other and all their children. It is their commitment I respect, not the marriage papers they signed.)

Now I will put the past behind me and head off into new frontiers of offensiveness and disrespect. Since the nine muses aren't exactly singing in my ears with ideas, I will simply complain for a while. It's my column, I can do stuff like this. Heh, heh.

First of all, why the hell can't they put anything good on T.V.? I've watched my share of television in my lifetime, and generally find it as entertaining as watching flies crawl on cow dung.

The networks show either hour-long dramas, which are basically excuses for sex, or half-hour sitcoms, which are about as funny as the Crisis in the Gulf. Cable isn't much better. HBO and the other movie channels just show current movies, which are two hour excuses for sex or two hour sitcoms. Everything else shows old black and white movies that have been colorized, which is, in my opinion like dubbing in voices over Charlie Chaplin. The only thing I ever watch on television, I'm embarrassed to admit, is MTV. It stinks, but I like music, so I endure it.

Second complaint: 2 Live Crew. To be succinct, they stink. They have no musical talent whatsoever. The whole censorship issue would be a lot more interesting if it involved someone who could make music. I've heard the 2 Live tape. It makes me want to either throw up or get a record contract. I can be just as obscene as those guys, just ask anyone who has played pool with me. And I could probably do it better. The powers-that-be should get a clue. Musical feces like this will die out if they just ignore it.

Third complaint: The cafeteria's

Senator's corner

by Kathleen McArthur
Echo Staff Writer

Student Senate met on Thursday, October 18 at 1:30 p.m. to begin the 1990-1991 school year. President Chris Varner called the meeting to order with the introduction of members.

This year's representatives are as follows: senior class, Brian Hemminger and Stacy Reagan; junior class; Amy Bontrager and Amanda Krenning; sophomore class, Greg Basham and Doug Hof; freshman class, Eric Booth and Landon Harris. Dormitory representatives include: Copeland, Vice-President Michael Goodrich; Davis, Jenni McCafferty; Lloyd, Spears Driskell; Gamble, Roger Howdysshell; and Pearsons, Andy Pratt. Commuter representatives will be decided at a later date. The class presidents are present for each meeting.

Varner gave out the new handbooks which include the procedures, policies, and constitution of the Senate.

This year's cabinet members were confirmed as Budgetary Officer Janet Gehlbach, Parliamentarian Sundi Sims, Treasurer Wendy Lane, and Secretary Kathleen McArthur.

Elections were held for vice-president and Presidential Advisory Council. Michael Goodrich will serve as vice-president. Elected to the PAC were Greg Basham and Roger Howdysshell. The council will meet once per semester unless the need arises for more frequent discussion.

Varner then asked for reports from committees. Election Committee Chairman Greg Basham reported that due to a misinterpretation of homecoming queen election procedures, new nominations for senior representatives have been held a vote will follow. The committee plans to establish strict guidelines to avoid future problems.

Food Committee has met with the new food service director. There will be a formal introduction dinner on November 1 at 6:00 p.m. in Pearsons Alcove. An open meeting of the committee will also be held that same day at 1:00 p.m.

Ad-Hoc committee, which serves as an addition to the Election Committee, will be represented by Spears Driskell and Landon Harris.

Senate meetings for the rest of the semester are October 25, November 8, November 29 and December 13.

schedule. I just know you haven't heard enough complaints about the cafeteria! Here's my personal viewpoint.

I never get up in time for breakfast. That is a given. As far as I am concerned, there are no hours before nine. By the time lunch rolls around, I'm ravenous. I eat lunch, and by the time dinner rolls around, I'm ravenous again. I eat dinner, and by the time 10:00 rolls around... there are no more meals left! I think we, the students (you all don't mind if I speak for everyone, do you?), should start a petition. Let's have another meal from 10:00 to 11:30 p.m. There would be four meals offered, and the students could choose which three they wanted on their meal plan. What a great idea! I amaze myself. No smart remarks, please.

Well, that's about it for my random complaints. There are more to come in future columns, trust me. Now, I have some things to say to you, my fellow students.

You bunch of weenies! I got plenty of verbal feedback on my column, some of it quite harsh, but only two people wrote letters! Why do you think I write this column? I need mail!

I've heard plenty of people saying, "How can you say that? It's so... wrong!" Well, you silent masses, don't get mad, get even! If you are so sure I am wrong, tell me why! Put pen to paper. Or, judging from some of the comments I've heard, put crayon to construction paper, and get your gripes out. I dare you.

Environmental Committee established

By Missy Flaherty
Echo Staff Writer

Maryville College has an Environmental Awareness Committee. Physical Plant Director Andy McCall is chairman. He is aided by a group consisting of two faculty-staff members and two students.

According to McCall, the main focus of the committee is "to make people aware." The committee has written a list of environmental initiatives and future goals geared to help make people conscious of the complex problems threatening our environment.

MC President Richard Ferrin states, "the issue for the 1990's is environmental awareness." Ferrin feels that the staff, faculty and students are becoming thoughtful (about environmental issues) as a good liberal arts college should be.

He feels "that recycling is a learned response."

"For instance, learn to make yourself to make those few extra steps to the aluminum can recycling box. Every little bit helps," Ferrin said.

He stresses that "individuals can make a difference," and that, "individually, we can make a difference by just recycling cans and taking one napkin instead of four."

Bruce Guillaume of Crawford House explains that there are basically three "R"'s concerning environmental awareness: reducing, reusing, and recycling. For example, reuse your MC cup... besides reducing the waste a paper cups makes, it also lessens deforestation. Isaac's and Pearsons Hall are doing their part by giving a ten percent discount when the cup is used.

MC is tightening up in other ways as well. Andy McCall's compost pile is coming along (although his fellow workers may have to resort to using noseplugs). MC saves all its grass clippings and leaves to fertilize trees and flower beds.

Fine Arts Center deteriorates

By Missy Flaherty
Echo Staff Writer

"Tough Issue," said MC President Dick Ferrin when asked to comment on the deterioration of the Fine Arts Building. In case you have not noticed, the Fine Arts Building is slowly, but surely crumbling away.

One of the main problems is the windows. According to Dr. Dan Taddie, Fine Arts Department Head, "When the building was being built years ago there was a shortage of steel, so wooden window sills were used, and now they are starting to rot and fall apart.

Another problem facing the building is the leaky roof; apparently, flat roof tend to leak.

But not to worry! There are proposals being prepared for fund raising for the FAC. One endowment, for replacement of window sills, has already been received.

"The Fine Arts Department is trying to get their ducks in a row to use the endowment money that has been circumvented for the replacement of the windows," said Taddie.

It seems the deterioration has also spread to the Maryville College Theater. The curtains in the theater are in poor condition. Thespians refer to curtains as "rags," but in the MC Theater, it should be taken literally: some of the curtains are actually held together with electrical tape.

Allen Reihl, Technical Director of the theater, sums it up nicely, "The Theater is the stepchild of the Fine Arts. So, in other words, the theater is usually the last to benefit from any endowments or monies given."

Maybe the department could use a fairy god-mother!

Pagles resigns position

Carl Pagles, Dean of Enrollment Management at MC since 1988, resigned September 18, 1990. He has assumed a new position as Vice-President of Admissions and Financial Aid at Hiwassee College in Madisonville, Tennessee.

"Carl came to Maryville in 1988 with a wealth of knowledge and experience that he gave to us in good measure," said MC President Dick Ferrin.

Bill Etling, Vice-President for College Advancement, has assumed responsibility for the Admissions and Financial Planning offices.

"Carl was looking for other alternatives," said Etling. "He had been working at this job for a number of years."

Although 1990 enrollment has increased from 697 to 703 students, this increase has not kept pace with administrative goals, according to Ferrin.

"Despite best efforts in the building of a good admissions team, it didn't work out with Carl as either he or I saw it," said Ferrin. "Some people are really effective in one environment and not in another."

Efforts to hire a new Dean of Admissions with a knowledge of MC and a solid background in admissions have been instigated, according to Etling.

The Admissions department has been aided by the consultation of Tom Jackson, who provided numerous recommendations that were instrumental in the fall 1988 and 1989 enrollment increases.

According to Etling, the admissions goal for 1994 is between 1000 and 1050 students.

"We want to provide a quality education without taking away MC's friendly touch. With Tom Jackson coming periodically for oversight and our new computer system, we feel we can achieve growth without adversely affecting the student body," Etling said.

Annabelle Libby is serving as Coordinator of Admissions during the search for the new Dean.

Access for handicapped is difficult on MC campus

by Michelle Hall
Echo Staff Writer

Maryville College strives to meet the needs of the individual in every aspect. Yet, meeting the special needs of a group of people, particularly the physically impaired, is a difficult process.

Currently, only a few campus facilities are accessible to handicapped students. A mere flight of stairs may prevent the handicapped student from enjoying the same benefits that other students do.

"Maryville College," states MC President Richard I. Ferrin, "works very hard to meet the range of needs in handicapped students."

He added that if students with learning [sic.] disabilities exhibit a need, the college tries to respond to that need, citing the fact that MC is especially "geared up" to educate deaf students.

According to Andy McCall, Physical Plant Director, the main requirements for a building to be considered handicapped accessible are: a ramp into the building to a floor which has an elevator and handicapped restrooms.

Presently, Thaw Hall is the only building on campus meeting these requirements. The rest of the building are considered inaccessible. These include many classrooms as well as all the computer labs.

In the future, any renovations or additions will include handicapped accessibility. The new Student Center in planning will be made completely accessible. The most current of the projects planned in the future, the renovation of Carnegie Hall, will include two rooms designed especially for handicapped entrance. There will be elevators to all floors.

According to Ferrin, there is a small fund for an elevator in Sutton Science. Plans for such an elevator existed in the original blueprints from 20 years ago, but funds were not available for installation.

At present, there are no plans to renovate the dorms; there are rooms available on the first floors for the physically impaired.

According to McCall, when renovating buildings as old as the ones on campus, accommodations for handicapped students often must take a back seat to simple safety considerations to meet fire and electrical codes.

"If I had to prioritize the use of funds, I would say that safety is our number one concern, and then if we have any dollars left, handicapped accessibility is considered," he stated.

He added that it is very expensive to go back into existing buildings and add something like an elevator. A whole new structure had to be added onto Thaw to install the elevator.

BAAL is here but the end of the world is not, at least not yet

by Stephen "Slade" Williams
Echo Semi-Staffer

Contrary to popular beliefs, the heading "BAAL IS COMING" that was printed in the last issue of the newspaper WAS NOT a satanic message. You remember, don't you? This was actually sort of a preview for this article. The picture that you saw was the cover of a novel by Robert R. McCammon entitled "Baal" (see Baal cover on the front page of the Echo).

So you can stop expecting fire and brimstone to rain from the sky, at least for now anyway.

Baal begins with the violent and peculiar rape of a waitress named Mary Kate Raines. While walking home late one night after work she is attacked by a very strange person in a dark alley. Now, I said that it was a very peculiar rape, and it was. I say this because Mary Kate's assailant left a very strange trademark, handprints branded all over Mary's body.

After she has been taken to the hospital, Mary's husband, Joseph, is informed of Mary's violent attack, but not of her entire condition, meaning the handprints. After becoming tired of not being allowed to see his wife and having information withheld from him, Joseph forces his way into her room and sees what the doctors were not telling him.

After Mary's physical recovery from her ordeal, she becomes determined to have a child. She and Joseph's discussion on the subject turn into arguments, and the arguments turn into fights which Joseph finally wins.

However, because of defective birth control pills, Joseph unintentionally impregnates Mary Kate. For some strange reason, Mary does not tell Joseph that she is pregnant for over a month. Of course he is infuriated when he finds out because he is in no position to pay for the hospital bills. Just to pay for Mary's bills after her attack, Joseph was forced to quit school and become a cab driver. Mary suggests that they borrow the money from her father; however, there appears to be resentment between the two involving Mary Kate.

Despite all the obstacles, the baby was born and named Jeffery Harper Raines. However, Joseph was not happy. For one thing, the baby had been named after one of Mary's cousins which he did not like.

The baby was not cute at all; it had "piercing, inquisitive blue eyes," and most of all, he was still mad about Mary Kate's deceptiveness early in the pregnancy. He became so angry that he began having troubled sleep and would get up in the middle of the night to sit and stare at the baby.

Two weeks before the child's first birthday, Mary reluctantly leaves Jeffery alone with Joseph while she goes to the store for groceries. When she returns, she finds Joseph in the bathroom holding Jeffery over a tub of scalding water. Mary then, after words are exchanged, kills Joseph.

Jeffery is put into a Catholic orphanage, and he begins to take on strange psychological changes. He takes on the name of the demon prince Baal who was worshipped by the Phoenicians. Baal was the god of fertility and the land, and in rituals honoring him, children were sacrificed and violent orgies took place.

Jeffery has also taken the minds of several children in the orphanage. In return for their devotion to Baal he has promised them a place in his kingdom to come.

After several encounters with orphanage officials, Baal ordains his disciples, and they burn the orphanage to the ground.

Baal grows into manhood and travels to the Middle East where he re-establishes the worship of himself and proclaims himself messiah. His mission, to spread chaos throughout the world and shame the Hebrew God, Jehovah, by deceiving man and destroying the world.

I would tell you how the story turns out, but that wouldn't be fair to you. Go out, buy the book, and read it! God knows that this country can use more people who can read.

MC Athletic Department considers future

by John Worth
Sports Editor

There is a rumor on campus that the athletic department is preparing for a major change. According to the rumor, MC athletics is going to change conferences, probably going to the prestigious NAIA (National Association of Intercollegiate Athletics).

The rumors are false, though not entirely unfounded.

The truth is, the athletic dept. is examining its program, a required function according to NCAA Div. III rules. The committee has not formally met and no decisions have been made. But no major changes are being made. At least, not yet. But the future is still open for consideration.

The committee will meet sometime this semester and try to hammer out what is going to happen. What has happened is simple: MC was somewhat painfully rejected from the Collegiate Athletic Conference (CAC), painful because the CAC is practically a southern Ivy league. It would have been very nice to have been a member of the conference. But the school just did not have what it took to be accepted. For one thing, the average ACT scores in CAC schools is 28. The average for Maryville is 22. But the administration did not seem worried about the rejection. According to President Ferrin, "We take a wider range of students and work hard to produce first rate graduates. The CAC is a dead issue." However, when asked about the rejection coach Randy Lambert, head of the athletic department, confessed, "I'd like to know why."

So, that option is no longer available (MC tried twice to enter the conference). But there are a few other options available, and several factors governing the decision. The main factor is travel time for the players. Sue Wyatt, Vice President of Student Affairs said, "Educational mission is our priority.." Ferrin added, "We want inter-conference rivalries that aren't all long road trips."

The other major factor is the issue of athletic scholarships. The school has a reputation of being non-scholarship. It is something that has been an issue for years, but the school prides itself in the fact that it grants no athletic scholarships. Many people claim that with such scholarships the athletic program would be better, that maybe the football team could have a winning season. But, the other sports do well enough without the scholarships, and in 1976 the fighting Scots beat St. Leo's college 63-2. When asked about the issue, Wyatt said, "Scholarships are an extreme option."

What are the options which are available? Maryville could stay where it is, in no conference. The school could join some conference, of which there are numerous possibilities, including the NAIA. The school could endeavor to create a conference. These are the three main options available.

The criteria for the decision will be, 1) What is best for the school; 2) What is best for athletics. When the committee meets, the options will be discussed and the decision made sometime next semester. Dr. Wyatt encourages the student body to contact the student representatives (Chris Varner and Lisa Locke) or the Highland Echo and give any input that could help make a decision. Wyatt added that, "Maryville College wants students to use talents and enjoy athletics and leave with a degree, and not take away from anything."

The Scots' offensive line readies for another charge in what could be their best season since 1981

Poetry Slams Maryville Campus at Isaac's

by Allan English
Echo Contributor

If you weren't at Isaac's last Thursday night, November 1, you missed it. What happened was the first Maryville College Poetry Slam. The event was thoroughly enjoyed by all who attended and participated.

You may ask what's the big idea and what did I miss?

Well, among the 35 people who attended, about 20 got up and read their own poetry. There were poems about love and nature, like you would expect at a poetry reading. But the flavor of the night was Midsemester Chocolate Bizarre. Some of the high scoring poems were about a host of entertaining topics. There was a poem about the Closet Monster, which was very much like a Poe story. The contest winner, about a horny voice teacher, was written and read by David Garzone. Garzone read beautifully and had the audience rolling on the floor in laughter. There also was a silly poem that poked fun at the romantics who write about deer and bunnies.

Essentially the Slam gave students a chance to read their works in front of an audience that booed or laughed, thought about the poems or faded out, or just listened for the enjoyment of it. The mood was fun-filled. It was something like the Gong Show meets poetry.

Judges rated the poems from 1 to 10, with a score of 30 being the best. No one's feelings were hurt because the judging wasn't serious, and a good poet does not care what judges think about his or her poetry. The whole thing was an opportunity for the students and poets to express themselves.

If you're upset that you missed it, don't be. Look for another Poetry Slam on Nov. 15. Come on out and read your poetry. There are prizes awarded to the winners and if nothing else, it's fun.

The Slam is sponsored by David Powell, instructor in the English Dept., and his English 215 class. Those of us who attended would like to thank Marriot for allowing the event to take place at Isaac's.

Come out and join us next time. We want to hear your poetry. We can't promise you a good time, but we can promise you the opportunity to have a good time.

MC receives $3.35 million gift

The funds from the Beeson estate will be used to endow scholarships, fund capital improvements (including additions and renovations of dorms, such as Pearsons pictured above and Carnegie), and establish a chair of religion. This is the largest single gift in the college's history.

by Jeff Huffman
Echo Ass't. Editor

This week, Maryville College was announced as the recipient of $3.35 million, the largest single gift the college has received in its 171-year history. The funds will be used to endow scholarships, to fund campus capital improvements, and to establish the Ralph W. Beeson Chair of Religion.

The Ralph W. Beeson Chair of Religion is only one of the developments made possible

"Maryville College is a worthy recipient of this gift. Mr. Beeson believed strongly in the value of Christian higher education as well as the Christian and humanitarian principles on which Maryville College is founded," said William E. Conger, Beeson's cousin and an executor of the estate.

Dr. Richard Ferrin, president of Maryville College, said, "I am very excited about this major gift," and added, "With more than 2.35 million going to endowment chairs and student scholarships, Maryville College's endowment now exceeds $11 million."

Beeson, who died in October of this year, was from Meridian, Miss., attended Meridian College and graduated from Emory University in 1920.

He and his deceased wife, Orlean, were long active in the Independent Presbyterian Church and made significant contributions through the years to Samford University in Alabama, Asbury Theological Seminary in Kentucky, the Independent Presbyterian Church and Maryville College.

MC chosen as first associate member of ORAU

by Jeff Huffman
Echo Ass't. Editor

Oak Ridge Associated Universities (ORAU) announced today the selection of Maryville College as its first associate member institution.

The associate membership is a new category created by ORAU to allow undergraduate institutions to participate with other member colleges and universities in a variety of research, development, training and education programs managed for the Department of Energy (DOE) and other federal agencies by ORAU.

As the first associate member of ORAU, Maryville College joins a university consortium of 59 member institutions including Vanderbilt University, Duke University, the University of Virginia and the University of Tennessee.

"We are extremely pleased to welcome Maryville College as our first associate member," said Dr. Jon Veigel, president of ORAU. "The College continues to impress me with its commitment to undergraduate research, as well as its success in preparing students for careers in science. They will be an invaluable part of the ORAU consortium."

President Ferrin said, "This is a tremendous opportunity for both our faculty and students to utilize the excellent research facilities available through ORAU in a mutually beneficial exchange of ideas and information."

To be considered for associate membership in ORAU, institutions must demonstrate an academic program with a priority for science, mathematics or engineering and meet ORAU's specified faculty and research requirements.

Annually, a high percentage of Maryville's science graduates go on to graduate school.

A management and operating contractor for the DOE, ORAU is both a federal laboratory and a university consortium.

"This is a tremendous opportunity for both our faculty and students."

A house divided?

The fact that a house divided cannot stand was made clear during the American Civil War, and then, from these important and tragic facts, the American states realized they did not have individual sovereignty, but sovereignty collectively under the federal system.

Throughout history, similar situations have arisen, and the resolution always resembles the outcome of the American crisis: separate branches of the same institution cannot viably act independently of one another in a fashion which allows the larger institution to exist and to maximize operation.

Focusing now on MC, the circumstance seems to exist or at least the potential for its existence is certainly present on campus. There seems to be a dangerous rift growing in the intentions of the college as an institution of higher learning (its primary and most essential concern) and the college as a proponent of collegiate athletics.

Paraphrasing a respected faculty member, academics must drive athletics, and it is only in this context that athletics should exist at MC, but in closer examination, that is not fully the present condition. Clarifying even further (for balance and safety), athletics certainly does have a place on this campus, an integral place, but everything lies in its execution.

There seems to be faulty execution in instances such as student-athletes being routed ahead of other students to register for classes and interims which most benefit the practice schedule, and not the academic schedule. There is faulty execution in athletes bypassing certain classes that would hinder maximum practice time. But condemnations cannot fall without commendations, and the fact that the athletic department hosts a mandatory study hall does speak well for them.

In a peculiar sense, no one is solely at fault for the present conditions, but everyone is accountable; therefore, it will take a collective, cooperative effort to rectify the problems and to insure that any solutions are not simple cosmetics.

Luckily, thanks to NCAA affiliation, such a corrective instrument has already been formed to probe MC athletics. This committee contains the requirements of cooperation throughout the various arms of the college—faculty, students, and the athletic department itself. From this cooperation will come a collective recommendation for possible solutions.

Yes, there are problems, but yes, these problems, once identified and solved, may allow for the academic and athletic personas to co-exist and eventually to grow into symbiosis. That's what a liberal arts education is all about!

A house divided or a healthy family feud?

Letters to the Editor

Dear Editor:

After reading the past two editions of the Echo, I was left with a negative feeling. This isn't what a college paper should do. Yes, we should print unbiased facts. Yes, we should question the system. Yes, we should print the bad with the good...but where is the good?

I am not saying that we should print a "Pollyanna" paper, but MC does have a lot of good things going on here and those "things" should be represented in our paper.

There should be more emphasis on the arts. Yes, people do read that. Student and faculty achievements...where are they? Happenings on campus? Upcoming events? Sports events? Social events? Let us know what is going on. Inform us...don't depress us.

The Highland Echo does a good job stirring up sensitive issues...and that's important. Why not round it out with some positive information and feedback...that's important too.

Missy Flaherty
Junior

Editor's Reply:

Your letter is appreciated, but in the past editions, information is exactly what the Echo has been imparting on the students. Truly, the information is depressing, but the Echo should be a vehicle which tries to give a truthful account of the subjects it covers, and not another MC cosmetic aid. However, the other purpose of the Echo seems close to realization with your letter: that this depressing news will stir the student body up to the point where they cannot sit and take it any longer but will react.

*Campus Question...What bugs you most about being a student at MC?

Living off campus and missing all of the activities. Amy Riddell, Sophomore.

Tuition is probably the only thing. And dealing with the business office. Lori Chambers, Senior.

I don't hate anything. Cari Polak, Junior.

I feel like they always want more money. My only regret at coming to MC is that it is costing me a fortune. Marilyn McCoy, Senior.

Not being told where our money is going. I really love the college and the area. Michelle Snyder, Senior.

The alcohol policy. Some student is going to get killed trying to drive back from Knoxville. Clint Boling, Junior.

The visitation policy is too strict. Joe Burns, Junior.

8 a.m. classes. Brad Friend, Sophomore.

I am bugged by students who squawk about taking the core curriculum and I wonder why they came here. Classes are a lot bigger than they should be, and many students are very juvenile, talking and passing notes. They act like they are still in grade school. Charles Bedoian, unranked.

Nothing really bugs me. Brian Beaty, Freshman.

Returning student offers view of MC life, home

by Mary Rose Slaughter
Echo Staff

At MC we have several returning students, also called "non-traditional" students. A returning student is one who is over 25 years of age and coming back to school after several years out of school or one under 25 who has been out of school for one reason or another for more than 2 years.

We are the ones, in the day program, who look like big brothers, big sisters, mothers, fathers, or grandparents. We find that since we didn't continue our education right after high school, we now need to return to college. I am one of the returning students.

According to The College Board, "Between 1970 and 1985, enrollment of students over age 25 grew by 114 percent compared to a growth of 15 percent for those under 25. By the year 2000, returning students are expected to outnumber the more traditionally-aged college students."

As returning students, we need what encouragement we can find. We must juggle a heavy schedule of school, work and family. We have full or part-time jobs, must do the shopping, make sure the chores at home get done, help the kids with their homework, spend time with spouses and still find time to get our school work done.

I, for instance, need more hours in the day. My son told me Wednesday morning as he went out the door for school, "See you tomorrow morning." I work Wednesdays and get home after he goes to bed, so there are 24 hours that I don't see my two youngest children.

One returning student on campus was asked by her little girl, "When are you coming out of the bedroom, Mommy?" She studies in her bedroom away from the family room.

We seem to find very little time left over at the end of a week, much less at the end of a day.

The hard part is finding time to relax. We feel we must do better than most traditional students. We have a great fear of falling on our faces in front of our younger classmates. We feel so slow and so dumb compared to students who have been in school, without break, nearly all of their lives. We have so much to relearn—like how to study, how to listen and how to take notes.

Some traditional students have told me, "I don't know how you do it. I'm just barely hanging on."

I think that as an older student I have learned what I call "sticktiveness." Some people call it perseverance, some call it commitment. Whatever you call it, it is what keeps you pointed toward a goal.

As older adults, returning students know what they want to change. And because we have probably experienced a little more of the world than traditional students, we know what we need to do in order to achieve that change.

There are a few things MC needs to do to help us with our needs. We sometimes feel as if we are not as important to the school as traditional students. Maybe MC could encourage support groups for those of us who need help.

The only support group on campus specifically for returning students is Woman's Information Network (WIN). It is for women. All those interested should call Dr. Lori Schmid. You are welcome at the meetings where the needs of the non-traditional student are discussed.

As a returning student, I have found MC to be a good school for learning to think, to weigh the options to a problem and to choose the best solution. This is needed in the workplace now and in the future. We have much we can offer to the college. We just want to be asked.

"Scapino!" is a hit-tino!

by S. Thrasher
Echo Contributor

The theatre department presented its fall production of "Scapino!" on Nov. 15-17, and Maryville College will never be quite the same again.

"Scapino," an 'Italian comedy' by Jim Dale and Frank Dunlop, is full of puns, noise and surprises.

The play is a love story, of sorts. Two young men have fallen in love with two young girls. But neither couple's parents approve. Both men also need large amounts of money but, for obvious reasons, cannot ask their parents to provide.

They do have a friend, however, in Scapino, who uses slightly deceitful cunning to help them get the money from their miserly parents. Their money problems are solved, and in the end a bit of irony reveals that the girls are from respectable families; in fact, one man's lover is the other man's sister, so they are perfectly suited to marry the young men. And Scapino is even forgiven for his trickery, so everyone is happy.

Matthew Osborne gave an excellent performance as Scapino, charming the audience and making them laugh, often with just a single gesture or expression. He worked well with fellow actors Kevin Cauley (Leandro) and David Kirby (Ottavio) in making the perfectly-time chase scenes and sausage tricks work. David Garzone also gave an outstanding performance as Senor Argante, Ottavio's miserly father, bringing out all of the humor of a grumpy old man who is easily frustrated and loves to argue. He often received applause. He worked especially well with Scapino and with Senora Geronte, Leandro's mother, played by Laura Connelly. Her character was also a miser but had a certain gullible quality that evoked sympathy in the audience.

Also in the cast were: Michael Hatcher as Sylvestro, Argante's somewhat lax but loyal servant; Charlotte Borderieux as the lovely Giacinta, Ottavio's enchanting wife; Julie Williams as the gypsy Zerbinetta, Leandro's love; Rob Riehl as Carlo, a mischievous bum and part-time shoe shiner; and Kathy Jarrard as the nurse. Leann Johnson, Karen Beaty and Krista Loy were dish-tossing waitresses, Sarah Sawyer played "the singer" and Keith Garrett was the guitarist.

"Scapino!" was directed by Steven Yhasz, who graduated from MC in 1975. He has worked both on and off-Broadway. He chose "Scapino!" because he "wanted to do something that was fun, that the students would enjoy doing and certainly something that would bring the community back into the theatre because they are such an important part of why we're doing theatre, both the college community and the city of Maryville itself"

Where have last year's issues gone: a perspective

by Christen Anderson
Staff

What ever happened to issues of importance on campus last year? Well, while some have progressed, others are still at a standstill. While the new alcohol policy has not changed, its punishments have been altered. A gay student support group has not yet been formed, and plans for the future look bleak. Students concerned with the homeless people of the world have maintained interest and are developing plans for 1990-1991.

The alcohol policy was one such object of debate last year. The new policy, which was implemented in the fall of 1989, does not allow the use or possession of alcoholic beverages on Maryville's campus. The only exceptions are if students are 21 years or older and are in specific areas or at special occasions approved and supervised by the school. The policy went into effect in order to comply with state and federal laws regarding alcohol.

While the alcohol policy has not undergone any changes since last year, sanctions for violators of the policy have been altered. According to Director of Campus Life Leslie Nier, MC has moved to a student assistance program that requires students attend insight sessions.

Nier, who attended a two-week program of instruction on counseling substance abuse sponsored by the Minnesota-based group Community Prevention, feels that the new program is a better way to deal with alcohol offenses.

"In the past I felt like we were merely shaking a finger at students who did not comply with the rules," Nier said.

Under the new sanctions, students who are written up once for alcohol are required to attend two insight classes. Students breaking the alcohol rules twice attend five insight classes and are placed on disciplinary probation. Students who further violate the rules are referred to the campus Judicial Board and sent to a local agency for formal assessment.

"The first session of insight class deals with alcohol education: the chemical process of addiction and the disease concept of alcoholism," said Nier. "The rest of the classes focus on the reasons why people drink and the feelings associated with drinking."

Nier feels that the new program will enable the college to deal more effectively with students' alcohol problems. According to Nier, the focus is on a campus-wide effort to control alcohol problems, including the help of resident assistants, sophomore assistants, resident directors, security and students.

"I hope in the future we will be more consistent in dealing with alcohol offenses. Our inconsistency creates confusion among students," she said. Nier says she sees no major problems with the alcohol policy.

"The policy is sound from an ethical, moral and legal standpoint," she said. "The liability of MC has fueled the implementation of the policy."

While Nier feels the alcohol policy has been comparably effective both this year and last year, she does see the need to develop a student group of non-drinkers and the planning of events without alcohol.

Another issue of importance on campus concerns gay rights. A symposium entitled "Issues in Homosexuality" was held last March and sponsored by the Center for Campus Ministry. The symposium, whose purpose was to raise student awareness of the subject of homosexuality, was viewed as a successful campus event. Dr. Glenn Hewitt, Dr. Bob Ramger and Mark Koerber served as panel members for the symposium, and Joanna Bender served as moderator.

According to Koerber, the symposium helped give people new perspective and knowledge about homosexuality. However, due to negative feedback from the community, a gay student support group has not been formed.

"Personally, the response I got from the faculty was positive," Koerber said. "But some of the students apparently don't want to hear about the issue, and the off-campus community was upset that the idea of a gay student support group was brought up at all."

In Koerber's opinion, the administration has been helpful but is blinded by public opinion.

"As a public issue, a gay student group has the possibility of damaging the college, while privately I think the administration sees a need for it and would want to go about forming such a group in a way helpful to both students and the college."

Although another symposium is not being planned, Koerber would like to schedule a meeting of the faculty, administration and students to discuss the issue and determine what can be done to meet the needs of gay students on campus.

"I still see a great need for a support group here," Koerber said. "But there is no point in upsetting the college community or Blount County. That just makes it harder for people who need such a support group."

Koerber points out that homosexuality has existed in every culture and period of time that can be studied, although some cultures accepted homosexuality while others rejected it.

"The bottom line is that homosexuality is not a gross deviation or an amoral thing," he said. "It is part of the human condition — people who are gay are people who serve a vital role in society and do not deserve to be oppressed in any form."

A third point in debate last year concerned the homeless people of the world. The plight of the homeless has been an important interest in the MC community for some time, and remains a vital issue. Last year, student Steve Ledman spent 24 hours in a cardboard box on campus to raise students' awareness of the homeless.

This year, a similar event is being scheduled, although plans have not been finalized. According to Spears Driskell, a "Night for the Homeless" is planned for January. The event will be sponsored by Amnesty International and the Programming Committee. Students interested in participating will sign up to spend the night in a tent on campus.

Forum speaker deals with inequality in South Africa

by Missy Flaherty
Echo Staff

On Nov. 15, the Rev. Motlalepula Chabaku was the speaker at the MC Community Forum. The title of her speech was "The significance of the Anti-apartheid Struggle," but her main interest is "Humanity in general...from children to the very elderly."

Chabaku dealt first with simple but often overlooked sign of inequality in society—inequality in language.

"We need to have a world that is inclusive, not only in relationships but in vocabulary," she said. "Why is there a bachelor's degree and not a spinster's degree or why is there a master's degree and not a mistress's degree?"

Chabaku then shifted to the more specific topic of inequality in S. Africa. She said that "Nelson Mandela is not a free man....he is not allowed to vote. Yet uneducated whites who cannot write can make an x and their vote is counted." She added that less than five percent of the whites vote but that their vote is given greater weight than that of black S. Africans.

"This is almost like giving prominence to the Ku Klux Klan and to the Nazi Party and letting them stand for the general opinion of the U.S.," Chabaku said.

Chabaku stressed, however, that there are a great number of white S. Africans who do not support the system.

"These are men and women of conscience," she said. "Some are killed and tortured for standing up."

Toward the end of the speech, Chabaku stressed that there is much that students can do to help solve problems in S. Africa and at home.

"Students have always made a big difference," she said, giving the examples of students changing opinions by protesting against the war in Vietnam and against nuclear arms.

The Rev. Motlalepula Chabaku contributed to the international flavor of this semester's Community Forum speakers, Thurs., Nov. 15.

"We need to have a world that is inclusive, not only in relationships but in vocabulary. Why is there a bachelor's degree and not a spinster's degree or why is there a master's degree and not a mistress's degree?"

Some of MC's biggest fans can be found on the Scottie sidelines every Saturday during football season.

Three familiar faces are Sally, Nicholas and Lauren Pavao--the support crew of Assistant Head Coach Jim Pavao.

When Sally is not cheering the mighty Scots on to victory, she is cheering enthusiastic "aerobicizers" to fight the battle of the bulge at Blount Memorial Hospital.

Scots football ends on a sour note, but has an overall bonny season

by Ramier Rodriguez
Sports writer

The 1990-91 Fighting Scots Football team completed a fine season, posting their best record since 1981. After sputtering to a slow start the Scots roared to a 5-5 finish. Under the leadership of third year coach Phil Wilkes the football program at Maryville College is on the rise. "I am pleased with the strides we have made but I am not satisfied," says Wilkes. He attests the early season setbacks to a combination of injuries and inexperience on behalf of the new student-athletes to the program. "Going into the season I felt that the first three games were going to be the toughest. The losses were tough but fortunately the team bounced back and jelled together."

The coaching staff was pleased with the way the Scots offense responded to the challenges of opposing defenses. "Our offense had great success because it was very well balanced," said Wilkes. The Scots offense threw the football more often, for more yardage, and for a higher completion percentage than in seasons past. As opposed to the previous season, the Scots passed for 400 more yards and

Soccer teamwraps up season with winning record

by Don Evon
Echo Contributor

For years the Maryville College Men's Soccer Team has been trying to "establish a winning tradition" (as their recruiting flyers emphasize), and this year's season may indicate that they are well on their way to doing just that.

Although the Scots were once again thwarted in their efforts to gain a national tournament bid, the team's 1990 record clearly indicates that they have no reason to be ashamed. Just one year after assuming the head coaching position for the Scots, Coach Pepe Fernandez guided his team to a 5-4-1 record and a fifth place finish in the South Region.

Led by captains Brian Moore and Ben Sohrabi, the team compiled victories against such powerhouses as Vanderbilt, Tusculum, Centre, Milsap and nationally-ranked Greensboro College, while losing by just a one goal margin to Emory University and Bethany College, both nationally-ranked.

The Scots offensive attack this year, headed by Senior Brian Moore, Senior Alfred Reitkerk and Sophomore Al Sohrabi, scored 60 goals, while the defense, led by Junior Patrick Hagerty, Senior Scott Snyder, Freshman Rob Norris and Freshman goalkeeper Ryan Riggins, allowed just 17 goals. Other standouts for the Scots this season included Junior Ben Sohrabi, Junior Patrick "Cheese Head" Mumpower, Junior Dale Allen, and Freshman Chad Brown.

"Obviously it was disappointing not to go [to the national tournament]," Moore said. But he also pointed out that the season was very positive in that "it has shown the younger guys what it will take to get there next year."

Although Moore has played his last game for the Scots, he says that he still hopes to contribute to the team in one form or another in the future, and he remains optimistic about next year.

"We've got a lot of talent coming back," he said. "A lot of talent."

Captain Ben Sohrabi admits that the team had a good season but feels that "there is still room for improvement. We're still one step behind where we need to be to go to the tournament."

The key for next year, according to Sohrabi, will be "just hard work."

completed 50% of their passes. The running game was explosive. Senior Robert Cox rushed for 422 yds., Jr. QB Kelly Moore ran for 495 yds., while Jr. Keith Washington pounded his way to 356 tough yards. Others which contributed were Scoval Blevins with 211 yds. and Brian Wright with an exciting 260 yards. "In years past our fullback has been our leading yard gainer which is unusual in the I formation" says Wilkes. "This year we were able to use the play action pass if they came at us hard or simply run it right at them is they played back".

On the defensive side of the football, defensive coordinator Jim Pavao's unit played with intensity. "I think that our defense played well weeks 4-8" said Pavao. "That is when we started to mature." The key to Pavao's defense was Sr. David Hunnicut. "David was the QB of our defense," said Pavao. "He has the ability to adjust and make the key play." Hunnicut led the team in tackles with 106; Wes Milstead led the Scots in sacks with 7. Both P.J. LeGreir and Pat Wade led with 2 interceptions apiece. The defense will have 9 returning starters back next year and coach Pavao feels good about the possibilities.

During the off-season the football team will work on strength and skills. The entire team will be working hard in order to improve on this years promising campaign. When asked what will it take to ensure an improvement next season coach Wilkes replied, "the off-season weight programs and how hard we work at them are vital." He further added that, "the student-athletes need to maintain their grades and return to the program. This is necessary to deter from having to play an abundance of inexperienced freshmen." The coaching staff also plans to recruit quality athletes to learn the system and back up the present starters.

There are five seniors on this years Fighting Scots Football team. They are Robert Cox, Brian Hemminger, B.B. Hudspeth, David Hunnicut, and Jay Malone. "I always hate to see senior go. They possess so much leadership and experience that really is going to be missed." Coach Wilkes and his staff have a positive outlook on what next years squad can bring. "I'm optimistic and excited. I can't wait."

Student reserves at MC called to active duty

by Jeff Huffman
Echo Ass't Editor

Six Maryville College students have been called up to military duty during a time of increasing military activity in the Persian Gulf area. Members of the United States Army Reserves, freshman Buddy Kemper and senior Tom Friend, were alerted days before Thanksgiving. Members of the United States Marine Reserves, sophomores Todd Koob and Howard Myrick, were alerted the day before Thanksgiving.

Koob, a fourth generation military person, said "I'm glad I have this opportunity to serve," and added "I've been prepared to go since August, since the invasion. There has been a definite need for military presence. I want to help anyway I can."

Myrick, who finished training during the summer, said "I feel I'm doing my job."

When asked if he was ready for whatever happens, Myrick responded "Marines, by definition, are a force in readiness."

Myrick also noted "Being a marine may mean giving up personal comfort and individual convenience. Then unselfish sacrifice prevails."

Koob added that "We marines are very motivated and have a deep desire to do what is right."

National Guardsmen Patrick Wade, a sophomore, and Tim Case, a senior, have not yet been called to duty, but are very confident that they will be called very soon.

Case, in an interview with the Knoxville News-Sentinel, said "If I get called, I'll gladly go, but if I don't get called, I'll be glad I didn't. But if I go, I'll give it all I've got."

Buddy Kemper, Ryan Tipton, and Wesley Milstead were unavailable for comment. The reservist's destinations were not disclosed.

At presstime, the number of multinational forces in the Persian Gulf arena totalled 350,000 troops. 240,000 of those troops are U.S. forces. That number is expected to increase to 400,000 U.S. troops by next month. Three and one third armored divisions and some 1,100 tanks are also being deployed for operation Desert Shield, where there are already two and one third heavy divisions and 800 tanks.

The United Nations Resolution authorizing use of force against the country of Iraq if it does not end its occupation of Kuwait will become effective January 15, 1991.

What happens to lost semester for students called to serve ?

by Mary Rose Slaughter
Echo Staff

With all the men being called up for active duty, what will happen to the MC students academic records?

According to Martha Hess, Registrar, "We are doing all we can do to accommodate them in every way possible." Some will take an Incomplete, some a Withdrawal, and some will try to complete their courses as quickly as possible.

Those taking an Incomplete will be allowed to return and complete their courses without penalty. If after an extended period of time, they are unable to return, their records will reflect credit hours comparable to the work completed.

"Each student is taken individually and judged accordingly," said Hess.

Dean Boldon, Academic Vice President, said, "What we are doing now is essentially what was done during World War II." He feels that each record must be looked individually and a program set up for each person affected by recent events.

Sue Wyatt, Vice President for Student Development, said, "It is interesting to see how patriotic these young men are. They are ready to serve."

An idea put forth by Boldon was that we as students might try to keep in touch with our men overseas.

Serving one's country not immoral

With the departure of many of our fellow students for overseas military duty, the realization that history does indeed repeat itself is beginning to hit. The ramifications of this fact might have tragic effects not only on our friends who have been called to serve their country, but also on the country that they have been called to serve.

Mirroring these contemporary events with events of the past is the question, "What are we doing there?"

Most certainly a valid question, but more important is the question, "How can we help those Americans who are there?"

We should not allow ourselves to fall into the mistakes of the previous generation which questioned soldiers serving in Vietnam as if they were individually responsible for the country's policy. They were (and are) merely carrying out the policy which seemed best for the U.S., as determined by the elected leaders of the country.

Thus, upon their return, and unlike a previous return, we should allow them to understand that their individual efforts and contributions are appreciated, even if the general policy, as a whole, is believed to be wrong or immoral. There is no immorality in the service of one's country.

Dave's World

On my negativism, the First Amendment and the ghost in Anderson Hall

You may be wondering why my column didn't appear in the Echo's last issue. Well, you are not the only one. For about three days I wondered too. Then, through word-of-mouth, I discovered that the staff advisor, Dr. Butts, had not printed the column because it was "a little, too negative." (No one on the staff saw fit to inform me of this fact.) I don't want to make a federal case out of this; I just have one thing to say: I'm paying $12,000 a year to go to this school, and I think that I've earned the right to voice my opinion about it. I'm not, and will never be a cheerleader for Maryville College. Anyone who wishes to write me, and I will send a copy of the column to their p.o. box. A copy of the First Amendment is available in the library. Now, on to more cheerful things.

This week, Dave's World will hit a serious note. Maybe even a "positive" note. Not because of pressure from the faculty, but because something happened last night that made me want to write.

A group of friends and I went for a walk last night about 2:00 a.m., mainly because we were bored and restless. The first place we went was Anderson Hall, to see the "ghost in the tower." According to legend, an old Civil War soldier who had gotten his leg blown off in battle was the caretaker of Anderson in its early days. He still lives there today, roaming the building at night and living in the tower. As my friends and I stared at the tower, we almost thought we could see his face looking out, his eyes catching ours and stealing our breath. It seemed ominous and frightening, and we left quickly.

From there we walked out the main entrance of the college. To the right, we saw the sign beside the road that told a brief history of the college, and how it had been moved in 1871 from its previous location at Broadway and College St. We decided to bridge and strolled through what used to be downtown Maryville. Some of the small shops in the town still have

Letters to the Editor...

Desert Shield

Letter from the sand:

It is me, your overseas bound classmate. It is about 9:30 (Saturday the 24th). We are on Interstate 40 East. I got up at 03:15 hours (3:15 a.m.). We left Knoxville at 0600 hours. We are supposed to arrive at Fort Bragg around 1800 hours (6:00 p.m.).

They say that we still don't know where we are going to be deployed. There are three possibilities: Germany, Turkey or Saudi Arabia, with Germany least likely, and Saudi most likely.

I am riding in a duce and a half (2 1/2 ton truck). I was supposed to drive, but the Captain didn't like the way I was driving- too slow at 55 mph. I had just learned yesterday how to drive one. My driver is alright. He is a Spec-4 (specialist). I ended up driving most of the way at speeds over 60 mph.

I am just going to let my mind wonder and write about things I've had on my mind lately. There is no set path I'm following.

I would like to thank my friends for their love, support, and help. I appreciate everything you did: making sure I got some sleep and got up on time, washing my dishes, cleaning my room, and helping me pack up my room and duffel bag (Lori S., Dawn H., Erica, Suzanne L., Kristi M., Emily S.C., Jen T., Krissi F.)

I would like apologize to all my friends who got written up at my farewell gathering. I appreciate you showing up. Student life authorities didn't like it worth a damn. We had fun though. Nothing was damaged, except some people's respect of others, but what the hell, life goes on. Aren't college students supposed to have fun?

There are several things that upset me about that Monday night, but one stands foremost. The RA's were played favorites. Everyone was to be written up but me (wrong answer!). Then I heard that certain people weren't going to be written up while others were going to be (WRONG!). Everyone should have been written up if the RA's were writing people up.

I know that rules were being broken. I know that some people will say that I had put out flyers advertising a party. There was no mention of a party, just a gathering of "fun, fellowship, and friend Monday Night Football." So what if it was a Monday night. Most people had already left campus, others were leaving Tuesday. I made sure I was not bothering anyone. I would rather have my friends (I have more than five or six buddies) come to my room than drive back from Knoxville after visiting Tall Paul.

We are not children and are not in high school. The college authorities are not my parents. My parents live in Terra Alta, West Virginia. If parents expect the college to act as a babysitter or even take the place of the parents, they, the parents, have a problem with not letting their children grow up to be their own person.

Enough complaining because I could go on and step on even more toes. I'm a die hard MC fan. I enjoy the people. If not, I wouldn't have stayed. It has been and continues to be a great experience. Isn't that what life is made of? That is one reason I joined the Army.

I would like to wish the men's and women's basketball teams good luck. Also good luck to the baseball and softball teams in the spring. I would like to wish Denise Beasley, Angie Boring, Sabrina Cefali, Bill Collins, and Scott Porter the best. Have faith in one another and have fun.

I would like to thank those of you who gave me cards and letters: Toriya D., Emily S.C., Jamie H., Erica C., Noel R., Catherine D., Jen T., Krissi F., Renee T (collectively), Leslie H., Joni H., Jan T. and the cheerleaders (mentioned above), Julie W. (for the white carnation), Robin S., Deb W., Jane P., Dawn H. (for the necklace), Stacy R. (for the cards signed by A-Bird, Yocom, Suzanne L., Erica R., Kristi M., Emily S.C., Dawn H., Frank S., and Jen T.) If I have left anyone out, I apologize.

A-Bird (Andy P.), Stacy R., Blake H., Frank S., Dave Y. [the Pearson's Second Floor Birdwatching Society] have one for me fellows. Dave, take care of yourself and Up With People. May 18th is on graduation. Hopefully, I will be state-side by finals week in May. Dave, we will get together when you return in January of 1992. We will graduate someday.

This is PFC Friend signing off from Ft. Bragg.

P.S. My Fort Bragg address is: PFC Thomas Friend, HSC 844th ENG BN, c/o General Delivery, Fort Bragg, NC 28307-5000.

Heard It on the Grapevine

Dear Editor,

It has come to my attention via the ever-reliable grapevine on campus that some students and several faculty/staff members were displeased with the 1990 edition of the Chilhowean.

Some protests were so strong, it was rumored, that the yearbook would be hidden from prospective students.

In response, I would like to congratulate the staff members who worked incredibly hard to produce an authentic college slice-of-life.

And as editor, I wish to inform those impressed and those that disliked certain copy inclusions that, as clearly stated in the book, the student quotes were taken directly from the "Library Pad."

We felt they were entertaining, perhaps a bit risque at best, and a fair commentary of certain elements of college bliss.

Moreover, the ultimate editorial decision was mine and mine alone. No offense was ever intended, obviously, as only a fool would purposely irritate the moral minority among us.

My intention was to produce a yearbook that was inspirational, fun and true to the individualistic attitudes of Maryville College.

In addition, Dr. Leonard Butts has been an absolute godsend to the student publications of MC. Yet, while he had no prior consent to any of the materials, he has been left to clean up the mess of dissension. I apologize to him for any unnecessary grief he has endured because a yearbook staff tried to break the mold of mundane yearbooks.

I wonder if anyone, besides his students, has acknowledged him for his invaluable contributions?

Finally, I wish to thank the Chilhowean staff for all our efforts and high hopes and thank Dr. Butts for his continual, if not approving, support of my creative ejaculations.

Some Praise and a Little Nit-Picking

Dear Editor,

A thanks to Christen Anderson for her retrospective article on last year's campus social issues. Such coverage goes a long way in keeping issues alive. I am compelled, however, to clarify a couple of points in the segment dealing with homosexuality and the potential Gay and Lesbian Student Union.

First, Anderson's quotations were, with one exception, her own, and while they approximated the essence of my stance on the issue they were neither my words nor did they convey my general attitude toward the administration. Which brings me to the second point: I neither stated nor implied that the administration is "blinded by public opinion." I stressed, quite implicitly, that I sympathized with the administration's position between the proverbial rock and a hard place. The administration must be responsive to public opinion. My hope is that they find a means of responding compassionately to both the community at large and the gay student population as well.

Lastly, Anderson quoted me as calling for a meeting of administration, faculty, and students to discuss the issue. The quotation implied that I was advocating something on a grand scale (and logistically impossible). What I recommended when asked what MC could do in an official capacity was that the best that could be hoped for under current conditions was the formation of a committee to explore the issue, recommend a policy statement, and develop a mechanism to meet this need at a more appropriate time. Such a committee would require representation of faculty, staff, and students.

Now that I've nit-picked, I would like to thank Anderson for the article, especially for the final quotation. I do believe that the gay segment of every community is a natural part of the human condition and that oppression of a group on the basis of sexual orientation constitutes a grave injustice.

Editor's Note: So many letters to the editor were received for this issue that we have given an additional page to them so that your voice may be heard on campus. The letters continue on page 4.

A House Divided Returns

Dear Editor,

Since I am a 1985 graduate, ex-athlete, and present coach here at MC, I feel compelled to write a response to the editorial that appeared in the November 23 issue. I think I can do an adequate job since I passed the "Sophomore Proficiency Exam" the first time I took it and I will complete my Masters Degree in Education Administration this spring.

There is no question that academics and athletics are integral parts of the "Liberal Arts" curriculum at Maryville. I do not feel that one must drive the other, but they should co-exist equally.

Athletes at MC do not get "special treatment" for being an athlete. If anything, they must strive to overcome more adversity than the normal student. Time management puts one of the greatest burdens on an athlete he has to face. I will admit some of them are not very good at it, but that's what the coaches and special Inquiry classes are for. We've been through what they've been through and we do the best we can to help them. Sometimes it doesn't always work.

In reference to the statement about athletes being pushed ahead in lines, the football and soccer teams were told by their coaches at fall registration and interim registration to get in line as soon as possible. In fact, both teams were required by their coaches to be there at team meetings for that purpose. No particular teacher or administrator participated, to my knowledge, in any type of activity like that. It may have seemed that way because they were in front, but there again is a time management lesson. The players were learning certain responsibilities.

Many of our football players are majoring in science fields. Those classes require labs and some of those students are taking two or even three science classes at a time. We encourage our players to take those science courses in the spring if they will be offered. It's tough enough for a regular student to take three science course in a semester, much less a student-athlete. We try to get them to take those labs on certain days because our practice schedules are different each day. Some days we need to work harder than others. These are all time management lessons and responsibilities that all the coaches are trying to teach their athletes.

If you think athletics is a problem now, you should have been here in the late '70's and early '80's when athletics did have control over everyone and the participants were of the renegade persuasion. If you think Gamble Hall is out of control ask some "old timers" about Memorial Hall (between Carnegie and the tennis courts) and Carnegie Hall life. Those were times when athletes could and did push everyone around that got in their way; they usually got away with it too!

The intellectual ability and character of the athletes that exist here now is 1000% better than it ever was. These young women and men give alot of themselves with time and effort. They don't receive athletic aid and they bring lots of public attention and media news to the college. They are not all perfect socially, but then neither is everyone else. It's hard to imagine on this campus without them. They bring school spirit and enhance it through their competitiveness. I'm glad we have a Homecoming weekend, winter basketball games, and spring baseball and softball when it turns warm again. If you think this place is boring now, what would life be like without these activities to fall back on. If you don't do these events, then you are always complaining about something to do. These events are safer than getting intoxicated in Knoxville with your friends and driving a car into a ditch on Alcoa Highway shattering your windshield.

I appreciate the athlete at MC, and only those who have been through it will appreciate them. I think alot of David King, who is a Presidential Scholar for two years in a row and a standout football player. It's fantastic that Lisa Locke can put in the extra time she does shooting free throws and jumpshots by herself and still maintain over a 3.0 GPA. It's athletes like her that have vaulted the women's basketball team into one of the top Division III teams in the country, and a group of women this school should be proud of. The excitement that these people generate, as well as others, is amazing for what they get in return.

The athletes here put a lot of blood, sweat, and tears on the fields and courts. I should know because I did myself. I'm proud to say I lettered in sports and graduated with a degree on time from Maryville, and these people should too! They have accomplished something more than a majority of people attending this college.

If you wanted to bring up an issue to stir up people, you have done that. I have nothing against you personally, but the next time you want to tale a poke at athletes think about it from the athletes side. He or she goes through all the pressures a regular student does plus the pressures of performing well. I know they do that by choice, but then again that's why they are athletes. They're special people!

Editor's Response: "A house divided" has been taken to mean many things which I never intended nor which were present in the article itself. The intellectual ability, character, and social graces of the players or coaches was never questioned or disputed. Neither did the editorial raise any questions pertaining to a "lack of something to do" at MC, something for which the athletic department should not be held accountable. The context in which the editorial was written, ironically, never intended to put the athletic department on the defensive (to use a bad pun), nor did the editorial become personal. It did intend, however, for the student body, at least those who are not athletes, to become more aware of the Athletic Committee and its role in the future of MC athletics. The following letter from the committee itself aids in this analyzation of present realities and future possibilities.

Dear Editor,

In response to the "A house divided?" editorial that ran in the last issue, an explanation of the Athletic Committee seems in order. The committee is responsible for advising the Vice-President of Student Development (Dr. Sue Wyatt) and the Athletic Director (Randy Lambert) on "matters of concern related to the athletic program of the college." The committee consists of two faculty members appointed by the Academic V.P. (Dr. Harry Howard and Dr. David Cartledge), two students appointed by the Student Senate (Lisa Locke and Chris Varner), a head coach appointed by the A.D. (Kandy Schram), and the A.D. himself (Randy Lambert), and the V.P. for Student Development (Dr. Sue Wyatt) as an ex officio member.

This year, the duties of the committee are greater than usual. The NCAA requires each member institution to conduct a self-study of its athletic programs and their relationship to the rest of the institution as a whole. The committee has been charged with carrying out this task. Among the issues to be addressed are MC's athletic philosophy, accountability of the athletic department to the institution, future of MC athletics with regard to conference affiliation, and how participation in athletics affects (academically and otherwise) our student-athletes. The committee will seek the MC community's opinions on these matters and take them into consideration before arriving at any decisions.

The committee is representative of the diverse population on campus, and a variety of opinions are heard at the meetings. The committee listens to its members' ideas and then attempts to arrive at a consensus. In this way we will arrive at "a collective recommendation for possible solutions." This includes opinions from the community at large. Any member will be happy to listen to concerns from the MC community. Please let us hear them; we'll be seeking them.

Respectfully submitted,
The Athletic Committee

Editor's Addition: Your response is appreciated and your explanation is a necessary addition to the editorial. Furthermore, another clarification of the editorial seems necessary. The purpose of "A house divided?" was most definitely not a condemnation of the athletic department; the fact that athletics has an "integral place" on campus was stated. "A house divided?" was not intended to condemn the present; instead, it was a look to the future growth and possibilities of the athletic department, and the Athletic Committee, as intended, will play a part in the determination of the future.

Dorm policies, conditions under review by staffs

by Michelle Hall
Echo Staff

After struggling with midterms and enjoying a brief respite over the Thanksgiving break, students must now endure the harried nail-biting time of finals. With pressure on in the classroom, tensions elsewhere are running high.

One does not have to look far to find a student willing to gripe. From problems with overcrowding to heating, most any aspect of dorm life is fair game. Students are sounding off in defense of their comfort and privacy.

About the heating, Freshman Alene Day said, "It's either 800 degrees or 30 degrees in my room. You can't control the heat; it has a mind of its own."

She added that she thinks the walls of the dorm are too thin.

"If I can't listen to my music at two o'clock on a Saturday afternoon, when can I?" she asked.

Freshman Larry Johnston agreed, but for different reasons.

Student senate approves resolutions on recycling and Amnesty Internat'l

by Kathleen McArthur
Echo Staff

Student Senate approved resolutions on a recycling program and on a charter of an Amnesty International chapter on campus in its Oct. 25 and Nov. 8 meetings.

In other business, the senate reviewed the Academic Life Council's goals for the year, approved appointments of commuter representatives to the senate and of alternates to the judicial board, and discussed the report of the Racial Justice Task Force.

At the Oct 25 meeting, Eileen Freund presented a resolution, sponsored by Chris Varner, to begin a recycling program in conjunction with the Environmental Awareness Committee, and Amy Bontrager proposed a resolution for chartering an Amnesty International chapter on campus. Senate also approved this resolution. Senate passed both resolutions.

It was reported that the ALC met to set goals for the year which include: reviewing the daily schedules, evaluating the comprehensive exam procedure, and discussing the possibility of holding more campus-wide meetings and convocations.

Budgetary Officer Janet Gelbach presented the activity fee budget report for October, and the Election Committee reported the problems with Homecoming elections and Senators were given a chance to express questions and concerns.

The meeting was adjourned at 2:25 p.m.

In the Nov. 8 meeting, Varner announced that Cindy Lemmons and Melissa Nichols would be appointed to Senate as commuter representatives. The Senate approved the appointment. There will also be an addition of commuters to the Student Programming Board. President Varner will meet with the board to discuss the selection process.

Landon Harris and Amy Bontrager were nominated to serve as alternates to the Senate Judicial Board. The Senate voted to approve the positions.

Varner led a discussion on the report of the Racial Justice Task Force. He and President Ferrin met previously to review minority life on campus. Presently, the goal of retention for minorities is 60%. The board thinks Maryville College needs to be more attractive to all people.

Senators expressed their views on the successes and failures of Homecoming activities, and Varner noted that there was very little turn out for the dinner introducing the new food service director.

At 2:43, the meeting was adjourned.

The last meeting for Senate this semester will be on Dec. 13. All interested students are invited to attend.

FAC recital displays student, faculty musical talents

by Michelle Hall
Echo Staff

The Maryville College Department of Fine Arts held a student recital on Nov. 19 at 7 p.m. in the Music Hall. The performances were given by students of the Fine Arts Department.

The recital began with two songs by Sarah Sawyer, mezzo soprano. Accompanied by Rhonda Cutshaw Mayfield, she sang "Adieu" and "Les Berceaux" by Faure. Etsuko Kato, pianist, performed the next piece, "Valse, Op. 69, No. 1," by Chopin.

Gregory Marmon, guitarist, accompanied by guitarist, and guitar instructor in the fine arts department, Phil Sanzone, performed two intricate pieces. "Caprice," by Carcussi and Sanzone, and "Etude No. 1" by Presti. He followed the two with a haunting solo, "Valse, Op. 32, No. 6" by F. Sor.

Cindy Huffstetler, soprano, then sang two songs by DuParc, the delicate "Chanson triste" and "Soupir." She was accompanied by pianist Jennifer Danner.

Members of the group Eurhythmic 121 performed three dances to illustrate various musical concepts. The group members were Larry Ervin, Larry Johnston, David Kirby, Masayo Ohashi, Christina Rapp, and Tina Walker. They demonstrated the concept of phrase with a dance to "Waltz in A Flat Major" by Brahms. With "To a Wild Rose," by MacDowell, they illustrated the concept of rhythm through their dancing. Finally, the group demonstrated syncopation with "Song of the Fox," by Bartok.

Next, trombonist Elias Smith, accompanied by Masayo Ohashi, performed the lively "Pearl" by Cook. He finished with "Larghetto" by Bordogni and Rochut.

The final performance by the group Artistic Differences was a sassy rendition of "Blues in the Night," by Paul Theissen. The group consisted of Sarah Sawyer, mezzo-soprano; Elias Smith, trombonist; Paul Theissen, pianist; Gregory Marmon, guitarist; and David Yocum, bass guitarist.

Dorm, from p. 4

"The dorms are not conducive to studying," he said.

"If you've got a test the next day, and twelve other people don't, you are screwed!"

Many students also expressed dissatisfaction with the lack of available parking space at the dorms, problems with thieves, and leaky roofs. Some also complained that the dorms are borderline overcrowded, suggesting that restrictions for living off campus be lowered as enrollment increases.

Most students agreed, however, that the dorm staffs and hall councils as sounding boards for student complaints are receptive to requests for change and eager to help. Whether they need a light bulb changed or are requesting an extension of visitation hours, most students feel that the staff is easily accessible and supportive. Likewise, the hall staffs seem to mirror the give-and-take attitude. The Davis Resident Director cited the new Davis escort policy as an example. She said last year there were only three incidents in Davis where males came upstairs and wandered into the shower rooms. She added that in the first two months of this year, ten such incidents were reported, sometimes not even involving MC students. After proposing the escort rule to the staff once without support, she finally implemented the change anyway.

"At first the girls didn't like it, but once they realized it was for a positive reason, they supported it," she said.

She added that since then, there have been no complaints or incidents, and the residents are more safety conscious, asking strangers whom they are visiting or what they are doing.

Lloyd Resident Director Cathy Pounders echoed the assertion that staff and students enjoy a good working relationship. Besides one theft and a few broken windows, she has heard little complaining.

Staff members said that evaluations and surveys are forthcoming, and there are always dorm meetings working as a forum for suggestions and feedback.

CE continues working to develop programs

by Mary Rose Slaughter
Echo Staff

As I was waiting to talk to Jo Wood, head of the Continuing Education Program, I heard her side of a telephone conversation. The caller wanted information on certain classes that she needed in order to get her teaching license in Tennessee. She was certified in another state but needed some more classes to be certified here. Wood directed the caller to Marcia Keith, head of the Education Department. This is just one example of what goes on in the CE Program.

The CE Program was created to meet the needs of the adult who either does not have a college degree or who needs to update his or her skills. Some adults take courses to change careers or to just keep learning for pleasure.

A mentoring system has been established for the new CE student. A CE student who has already taken at least one class and who wishes to help a new student is paired on a one-on-one basis. This system helps the new student adjust more easily to the new environment.

Another program started recently for part-time students is the organization of Zeta Phi. They have planned a Christmas party for December 15 at the House in the Woods. This is to be a gift-raiser for the Rose McNabb Center for Abused Children. For more information call Wayne Osborne, president of Zeta Phi, at 983-3756.

Wood said that they are always revising their programs to meet the needs of the students. An Advisory Board is being formed to help present MC to the community. This board will be able to help pinpoint the needs of the businesses in the area and provide a sounding board for ideas for new classes in the CE Program.

At this moment there is a program being developed that will prepare the student to enter the Human Services job market. An Orientation Seminar for Re-entry Courses geared for the adult is being planned, also.

The CE Program is alive and growing.

Can live Christmas trees save the earth from sunburn?

by Missy Flaherty
Echo Staff

Well?

Trees absorb large amounts of carbon dioxide (CO<sub>2</sub>), a main culprit in global warming.

What is global warming? It is the general warming of the earth, caused by the trapping of heat close to the earth's surface.

"So what?" You reply. "I like warm weather."

And most of us do. But global warming, also known as the "greenhouse effect," could cause an ecological disaster. Oceans, lakes and rivers would rise from the melting of glaciers. Our fresh water supply would be depleted. Whole states could be submerged and the food chain disrupted.

"Oh, no," you say. "How can I stop this?"

The main source of the greenhouse effect comes from the emission of carbon dioxide, which is caused by the burning of fossil fuels—coal, oil and natural gas. Carbon dioxide is also released when trees are burned or cut down.

But trees—live trees—also absorb carbon dioxide and release oxygen. Planting 100 million trees, according to the book "50 Simple Things You Can Do to Save the Earth," would reduce carbon dioxide omissions in the U.S. by 18 million tons, and energy consumption by 40 billion kilowatt-hours (which would save $4 billion annually).

Planting trees also has a cumulative effect because each tree that you plant will provide benefits for years to come.

So you see, this is a roundabout way of saying that planting trees is good, and that planting Christmas trees is even better. Every Christmas millions of people the world over decorate their homes with traditional Christmas trees. If all of those trees were purchased "live" and planted after Christmas, we could be saving energy and slowing global warming.

If you do decide to save the earth by buying and replanting a live tree, here are a few tips from a local nursery on selecting and caring for it:

—Norwegian Spruce trees are the best to buy for this climate.

—Live trees should be in your home only seven days.

—Keep your tree watered while it is on display.

—When planting the tree, make sure to loosen the burlap around the root ball before covering it with dirt.

Merry Christmas and happy tree hunting!

Roundball Wrap-up: Lady Scots show promise Gentlemen Scots better than record indicates

by John Worth
Echo Sports Editor

The athletic department is once again geared up to supply excitement to the MC community. It is basketball time, and the teams are ready to whet the appetites of all sports fans.

The lady Scots have got a promising season ahead of them. At 6-1, they could prove to be the best team the school has had in quite a few years. Though young, they have all the skills needed to have a winning season.

The season started in Washington DC with the Truss Bank Tipoff Classic. It was a blowout for the Lady's. They swept the tournament, defeating Nationally ranked Roanoke, Elizabethtown, and Greensboro. Against Elizabethtown, the team proved that they can overcome adversity by erasing an eight point deficit at halftime, going on to win 73-66.

The team left the tournament and went on to produce devastating results. Emory-Henry left the court losing 77-36; Piedmont College fell 80-67; Greensboro ran the gauntlet twice, losing 69-47 in the first game (tournament), and 79-60 in the second. The only loss came to Tusculum, a disappointing 82-64 defeat.

The game was played evenly in both halves, with the exception of the last five minutes of the first half. At that point the team was only down by two points. But, as coach Wes Moore said, "Five minutes can kill you." The two teams will play again next semester at MC, and the Lady's will try to even the matchup.

The team has a lot of potential, and will try to continually improve as the season progresses so that they will peak during post-season play.

"Control is sometimes inconsistent," Moore said, contributing this to the teams youth. Yet the freshmen are a big asset to the teams success, as Leah Onks proves, averaging 13 points per game.

The Men's team has had a rather rocky start, but will hopefully improve as the season progresses. They are 3-2, but have no big gripes about the losses. The teams they lost to were strong organizations that will more than likely be in the Div III top 20. Head coach Randy Lambert said "[the losses] came because the Scots didn't execute properly during the last 8-10 possessions of each game, and there were some critical turnovers."

But the team is still above 500%, and is confident about the future.

"I believe our best ball is ahead of us," Lambert said, encouraging the fans to come out and watch the games. "They will see an exciting brand of ball with a variety of offensive attacks from a strong inside game to three-point displays with an occasional dunk."

The offensive attacks will be led by a large inside game, with Bobatu Willingham at 6'8" and Glenn Cullop at 6'7". Kelvin Richardson is another strong player, averaging over 20 points a game, shooting 45% from three point range and a 33% free throw average. Bobatu Willingham is 61% from the field and also 33% from the line. Glen Cullop is averaging eight points a game hitting 58% percent from the field and 67% from the line. The only sore spot in the team would be their defense.

"We can't prevent penetration," Lambert said. "We'll spend the next few days concentrating on defensive fundamentals."

"We're hoping to put together a string of wins to improve our record," Lambert concluded. "We're a better team than our record indicates."

Thoughts on MC facilities for indoor exercise season

Commentary

By John Worth
Echo Sports Editor

Well sports fans, the football season is over, and the basketball season is starting. It is an exciting time in the sports department, colder weather forcing students to retreat to the indoors to get their exercise. But there is a dilemma here. It lies not in the hierarchy of the department, but in the lower levels.

One problem that has been on my mind for a while now concerns the weight room. For one thing it is devoid of mirrors, something I grew accustomed to when working out in off-campus facilities. But that is minor. The crux is in the fire escape. There are two official exits from the weight room, the main doors and the fire door. Now, were there to be an act of God and a fire struck the PE building, I would not want to be on the premises. You see, oh loyal readers of free mail-room literature, the fire door is held fast not by a fire marshal approved locking system that can be opened in case of emergency, but by a master lock, the bolt approximately one-half inch in diameter. This bothers me. Call me foolish, but I find no comfort in the fact that, if something did happen that would render the main door useless (say a chlorine leak), I would have to suffer a fate worse than death in the weight room because the fire door is impassable. I don't think I am being unreasonable. I know the chances are slim to none that something will happen. But God forbid a safe escape in case it did. Perhaps those in the weight room are expected to be Manly Men and scorch our skin to a nice medium-well as we run through the blaze. However, I assure you that if there is a fire, I will find a way out.

Another point that is touchy and will no doubt prick a few backsides has to do with the hired prick in the department. I know I am not a real athlete and should have to wait behind those who work hard to make great strides in their chosen sport. But this in no way means that I should have throw my basketball against the gym wall because the goals are up. A little over a week ago I searched 30 minutes for someone to lower the goals. I finally grabbed an assistant basketball coach who was kind enough to give me a suitable place to play ball. The point is that the regular gym personnel were not performing their duties and were off somewhere doing something that probably was not related to their job. I don't know this for a fact. Maybe they were in the racquetball courts. I looked everywhere else. It may not mean a lot to those who get to use the facilities as part of their sport, but to those of us who enjoy an occasional game, it can mean a lot. I'm not going to get suicidal over this. There are more important things to die for than the goals not being down.

One of these has not occurred yet, but will as soon as indoor soccer starts. It is an admirable sport. But it uses the far right gym (dubbed the 'dust bowl'), and the far left gym will often have the bleachers extended, leaving only the center gym in which to play basketball. So me, and anyone else wishing to play, go onto the middle court. Then we are told to leave. We ask to have the bleachers pushed back, more than willing to help. We are denied the request and have to shoot in the small space allowed with the bleachers out, a distance perhaps extending to the foul line. This is hardly a fair arrangement. For one thing, why have the bleachers out when no game is being played. People get paid to push them in and out. And what harm is there in playing on the middle court. Are the coaches afraid that someone might get a little sweat on the floor. The team practices on it. There would be very little difference in some people playing ball on it for fun. I doubt very seriously that the goals will be damaged by too much shooting.

I realize that these points may not concern a whole lot of the campus community. In fact, I doubt if anyone besides me even realizes that the problems exist. Maybe I will open a few eyes with my insightful comments. More likely than not the only thing I have accomplished is to make a few more people dislike me. My face shows very little concern. I am merely an athletic want-to be desiring some some fun, safe athletic competition. Is that too much to ask.

signs in their windows that look like they were written in the fifties. We saw the building where the old AM station was, and the old pink hearse that they were trying to sell.

Halfway through town, we came to the courthouse. In front of the courthouse, there was a monument built in honor of the war fatalities of Blount County. An iron soldier stands at eternal attention, one hand behind his back, and his eyes staring into the distance. Maybe it was the light, but I almost thought I could see pain and determination reflected in those unblinking eyes. We looked at the list of names on the monument and wondered how many of those young men had been students just like us, how many had felt the same fear of war that we face. We wondered what familiar names might appear engraved on the memorial in the future.

From there, we went to the town cemetery and wondered amidst the gravestones. An almost full moon shone down on us, with an eerie ring of clouds making a perfect circle surrounding it. It seemed like it should have been scary, but it wasn't. All we felt was a sense of peace and deep respect for the people buried there. We saw a grave belonging to a twenty-day-old baby boy. We saw the graves of a couple that had lived seventy years and then died within days of each other. We saw the grave of a Civil War hero named Cates who had outlived the war by years. A few minutes later, we noticed that the street we were on was named Cates. It occurred to me that the names on the gravestones were not just names, but real people who were worthy of respect.

The town we lived in and the college we attend are precious. Despite the current ineptitude of the current powers-that-be, we still should respect the college's long history. Take some time this week and stroll through Maryville. It looks like a picture from a history book, if you look past the litter on the streets and the cracked and aging buildings. If someone took the time to care, Maryville could be beautiful. Instead, we have sixteen

Burger Kings.

On our way back to the college, we passed Anderson again. As I glanced up at the tower, I didn't feel the same chill that I had felt before. Instead, I felt a strange warmth, a sense of comfort. The ghost of the past lives in that tower, watching us all. Perhaps we should acknowledge him more often.

JANUARY 25, 1991

MC announces Vision 1994

by T.T. Crabtree
Echo Editor-in-Chief

In the face of international tension and crisis, MC marches on. It marches toward 1994 and $22 million dollars.

Monday at Club LeConte in Knoxville, Maryville College, officially, announced the Vision 1994 national campaign that will allow the college to keep pace in the changing world of higher education.

The campaign, the brainchild of Dr. Richard Ferrin since his arrival on campus, will be headed by Dr. Dan McGill. McGill, a local farmboy made good from Greenback, is an MC alumnus. He also has degrees from Vanderbilt University and the University of Pennsylvania where he received his doctorate. Recently, he has been teaching at the prestigious Wharton School of Business at Pennsylvania.

The larger-than-life figure of McGill, otherwise known as Mr. Pension, defined the various facets of the campaign. The monies received will be allocated to be used in six different capacities by the college: restoration, new construction, endowment, acquiring additional learning resources, and ongoing gifts.

The campaign will allow the campus not only to expand to accommodate the growing needs of the student body, but it will also allow the college to maintain its moral and ethical fabric, according to McGill.

McGill then turned the proceedings over to Ferrin, who needed no introduction, with the astounding question, "What have you been smoking?"

Ferrin, looking over the crowd of faculty, students, and alumni, proceeded to give his vision of higher education in East Tennessee, a vision in which MC plays a prominent role as a "top-notch, first rate liberal arts institution."

"This room holds more than good feelings," Ferrin stated.

Right he was, the room held a cross-section of the MC community which is rarely free to see one another outside the typical guises of student and educator.

The announcement occurred in a room which honestly exhaled the re-emerging importance of MC and, therefore, the liberal arts. It did contain an air of applied formality that did not initially bode well for the non-name tag wearers of the crowd, but the proceedings began, and the camera lights lit up, the crowd grew more relaxed.

From Ferrin, the proceedings were turned over to the faculty leader, Dr. Bill Dent. He offered the hopes of the faculty that the Vision included such things as pay increases to comparable levels among their peers at other institutions. He offered to support of the faculty to Ferrin for his Vision.

The students were represented by Student Senate president Chris Varner who offered Ferrin the same support from the student body. He reaffirmed the distinctive tradition to which McGill had previously proudered referred.

Breakdown of the funds already raised in the Vision 1994 campaign and the remainder needed to meet the goal. The fund will aid the college in the expansion of the campus.

Then, with the announcement over, the group was set free to mingle.

"McGill is a tremendous asset to the campaign. He will provide wisdom and leadership," pronounced Joanna Bender, when asked for a comment during the mingling.

Jane Richardson stressed the outpouring from the community when asked for her thoughts on the campaign.

Rambling no comments from the word go, Dr. Dean Boldon mingled around the crowd with a glass of champagne punch in one hand, but it was obvious that his enthusiasm for the campaign simply could not at that time be translated into a good quote.

The support for Ferrin and his Vision was obvious, and the $9 million dollars already raised testifies to that support.

MC AND WAR : INSIDE

Echo Editorial ...

Right now, the two most important question that the MC community and the national community must address are, why war ? and why protest?

Each of these questions, once the initial process of investigation begins, spawns many other questions and concerns that must be addressed and then answered for the individual, the community, and the nation to properly grasp the onslaught of war. But these two questions are the springboards that must be taken, discounting the political or personal beliefs of the individual.

After sufficiently discerning the correct springboard to take, other questions begin to flow.

Are we just there for oil? Does it not matter that sanctions did have some effect? Should the U.N. have the power it did in this situation? Should aggression go unchecked even if it seems that war is the only way of preventing further aggressive acts? Does the fact that the U.S. is acting along with an allied coalition matter? Why do so many pro-peace demonstrations escalate into violence? If the war is not supported, what about the American soldier? Should the soldier take the blame for international policy makers? If the flag is burnt in protest, does that mean that the protestor supports an Iraqi victory? If not, what is the motive for burning the flag, to protest against America as it should be or to protest against how it is perceived? Should we fight for the economic benefit of others? If petroleum is the main issue, why have there been so many previous protests against the development of alternative power sources such as nuclear energy? Does protesting help troop moral? Do the troops matter if one does not support the war? What will You do?

There are no easy answers, but there are endless hard questions. It is more important than ever, now in the face of this war, that people know not only what they believe but also (and this crucial) why they believe as they do?

Those who support the war should realize the ramifications of America at war that their support may evolve into actual service. Those who do not support the war, it is hoped, should at least support the American troops in service in the gulf. Both sides should analyze their positions carefully, and learn to co-exist. The last thing that America needs is to be internally divided.

Letter From Tom Friend

Dear Campus,

It's been twenty four hours since I left. It was great to see those of you I did. Blake, it was nice talking to you on the phone.

I want to say thanks for everything: pizza from Suzanne, Sherry, Donna and Robert. Also Pizza with the "Quad" (Emily, Angela, Lisa, Kristi and Cindy.) Frank, now you can say that you had a party in your room.

Thanks man. Greg D., Kelly B. and Denise B., I enjoyed playing cards with you. A-Bird, we had another great get together to remember. Once again, we were asked to leave. Kelly M., I appreciate letting us come visit you. Everyone who offered me a place to stay. Thanks. I hope the offer is still good when I return in November to visit again. Brad and Chad, thanks for the use of your room, even though I wasn't there very often.

Krissi Faler, this saying is for you. I showed some friends ("The Quad"). Since you didn't want to say good-bye, this quote is for you. "Sometimes, we have to say 'Goodbye' to friends ...so that we can one day say 'Hello Again!'" This quote is from a Ziggy cartoon. Smile Krissi, and I'll C U later.

I heard rumors that students were going somewhere to protest against war. That is your right, but I don't think it'll do any good. I would like to know what you are protesting against. War is inevitable. Even our Lord God has allowed war. War is part of man's history.

I don't like the thought of war. I am an American soldier and have pledged to follow the orders of the President of the United States. The President was asked by the Saudi Arabian ruler to help protect Saudi from Iraq.

If in the 1930's the European governments had not appeased Hitler, what would have happened? Appeasement led Hitler to believe he could do whatever he wanted. No, I am not comparing Hitler to Hussein, but I am the situation. I am a history major and was doing my I.S. on how the United States got into World War II, Korea, and Vietnam.

The U.S. was fighting unofficially in China in the late 1930's. We gave equipment and money. We gave weapons to allied countries in Europe prior to our entry. The U.S. was in Vietnam after WWII, financially. The U.S. is seen as a protector of freedom.

I guess what I am trying to say is that we may be fighting for something you don't believe in, but we are helping protect others and possibly you. I'm not arguing with you, just how I see it. Please write if you would like to discuss this with me.

Students, others speak on the War

The Highland Echo allows students to respond to the war in the Persian Gulf. We asked students, faculty, staff, and some important others four questions.

The questions were:

A: How would you have handled the crisis differently than President Bush?

B: Are you supportive of military action?

C: Would you enlist or serve if called?

D: Do you have a clear idea of why the U.S. is in the Gulf?

Howard Beckwith, So.

A: I think Bush should have waited longer.

B: Yes.

C: Yes.

D: Yes, Hussein is not like Hitler; I think we stepped in at the right time. I felt like we had to do something.

Michael Freels, So.

A: I probably would have sent Rambo over there to take care of him.

B: I am supportive now because Iraq bombed Israel.

C: No.

D: Yes, they want to balance power. I don't think the main reason is oil because we don't get that much from over there.

Brian Wright, Fr.

A: I wouldn't have handled it differently.

B: Yes, to a certain extent.

C: No.

D: I have vague ideas: for oil, save money; we are looking out for us more than Kuwait.

Jannette Judy, Jr.

A: I would have stretched out the deadline.

B: Yes, if it is on the defensive and not the offensive.

C: Yes.

D: No, I think all we can do is be supportive and hope for peace.

Quentin Davis, Jr.

A: I don't think I would have (handled it differently.)

B: Yes, because it was his last resort.

C: Yes, if it was not combat.

D: To come to the aid of Kuwait.

Marecia Hall, So.

A: I would not have handled it differently.

B: Yes, if all other possibilities have been extinguished.

C: No.

D: Yes, because if we allow him to take over Kuwait, then there would be no free America.

Peggy Lane, Sr.

A: I would have educated the public more, and I would not have waited around so long. If I felt that war was necessary, then I would have gone to it swiftly.

B: Yes.

C: If I really understood why they're fighting, and if I believed in why they are fighting, then I would not wait to get drafted, I would enlist.

D: From my understanding they don't want him to get that much control, and Kuwait controls 30% of the oil, and we get 8% of that oil; if he gets control of Kuwait then that would effect our economy our economy because we rely so much on oil.

Timothy Malone, So.

A: I would have done it in shorter time.

B: No, not unless it's going to effect us majorly.

C: Yes, I would go if called.

D: No, I have a lot of mixed feelings. I think the government is telling us one thing but meaning another.

Pam Russell, Fr.

A: I agree with everything that has been done.

B: Yes, I am supportive.

C: Yes, I would go.

D: Yes, if we don't do anything now, it could get worse, Hussein might become another Hitler or something.

Ramier Rodrieuz, Jr.

A: I would have mobilized a lot sooner than he did; I would have gotten U.N. support much sooner, before they had five months to fortify themselves.

B: Yes.

C: Yes.

D: Yes, America is liberating Kuwait, attempting to stabilize the world economy, attempting to keep up their "Big Stick" diplomacy policy.

Timothy Lawrence, Jr.

A: I would have tried to come up with a solution besides war.

B: as defensive, but not as an offensive tactic.

C: No.

D: Yes, for oil. I think it is due to this country's greed; Bush wants to uphold the country's image.

Richard Bauer, Fr.

A: I think I would have handled it the same way.

B: 100% supportive.

C: Yes, I would go.

D: I think so, the oil problem, and we are trying to liberate Kuwait from Saddam Hussein.

The Echo Supports the Troops in The Gulf

The Echo wishes to comment on the timeliness of this poll. Many of the interviews were conducted before the outbreak of hostilities and the bombing of Israel and Saudi Arabia.

More reactions to the Gulf War

Robin Morris, Jr.

- A: I would have wanted more research on new ways of energy.
 B: I understand that it is what is needed right now, but I wish there was another way.
 C: If I was called, I would go- if they called women.
 D: I think alot of it has to do with the way our economic sysytem is set up.

Wendy Vandriver, Fr.

- A: I think we went too fast.
 B: Yes.
 C: I would go if I had to.
 D: No, not really.

Julie Nemec, Fr.

- A: I would not have handled it differntly.
 B: Yes, 100%.
 C: Yes, I probably would.
 D: Yes, I think it was mainly set up to stop aggression.

Tshiko Mukabaka, Fr.

- A: I would not have sent troops to Saudi Arabia.
 B: They should have only used the Navy to control the economy in the Gulf.
 C: No, because I am not a citizen.
 D: To avoid Saddam Hussein from controlling oil sources.

Brett Sams, Fr.

- A: I would not have given Hussein so much time.
 B: Yes.
 C: Yes.
 D: To show the world that the U.S. and other free nations will not allow unprovoked aggression against other free nations.

Dr. Wallace Lewis, History.

- A: I would have held back on going to the U.N. so quickly. Timing.
 B: If Hussein won't budge, yes.
 C: Would not enlist but would serve.
 D: It can be defined as a war over oil, but a better definition would be a war against aggression, not Iraqi but Arab. It is basically political.

Beth Bishop, So.

- A: I don't know.
 B: No. Too hasty.
 C: Yes.
 D: To protect our oil interests

Mark Koerber, Alumnus

- A: No, differently.
 B: I see the military as an international political necessity.
 C: Don't know...too old.
 D: It has to do with the growing international order, the growing influence of the U.N. and our responsibility to the international community.

Skip Heverly, Sr.

- A: I would not have bulit the troops up to the extent that hey were so quickly. Would not have fired the first shot.
 B: On whose side?
 C: Yes.
 D: Yes, I understand why we are there.

Dave Garzone, Sr.

- A: I would have called Hussein personally and said, "Shame on you. Get out of town, dammit!"
 B: No.
 C: Don't know.
 D: Oil.

David Kirby, Fr.

- A: I don't know if I would have handled it any differently.
 B: Yes.
 C: Yes, most definitely.
 D: I think it is to keep the status quo and to give Kuwait there land back.

Sarah Sawyer, So.

- A: I would have allowed more time for economic sanctions.
 B: No.
 C: No.
 D: Kuwait is the official reason. The government is concerned with our oil supplies.

Echo response to the War...

The Echo declares support for the troops in the Gulf, and especially for those students that were called from the MC community into the service of the country. The editor feels that actual paper support for either camp, either the pro-war or pro-peace camps for lack of better terminology, would not be beneficial for the community.

The crisis in the Gulf started a fragmenting process which the war has only escalated. It is the job of the Echo not to fragment or divide but to unify and inform. The country, itself, is now undergoing the same type of fragmentation that it underwent during the Viet Nam era in the Sixties which was highly promoted by campus papers and the national press. The MC community and the country should not allow itself to be divided at any time, especially a time of crisis such as now, and the press should not allow itself to participate in any process which will put American against American.

The Echo does have a place in this crisis, but it is only a place that MC gives it. The paper exists for student reaction, response and beliefs. By allowing those with differing views and beliefs to be read by the entire community allows the fragmentation, which already exists on campus, to be slowed and, hopefully, reversed. The paper serves as a medium which the student body, faculty or staff may use to find those crucial points where their views coincide. Once these common beliefs have been identified by both camps, more communication and understanding begins.

We as a so-called college community are mandated to search out for some understanding of those with whom we disagree. The Echo is here, and the editor hopes that both sides will use it in just such a manner.

Sooner or later...

by Amy Bontrager

Why do we resort to violence to attempt to resolve our conflicts? If we have to availability to learn and gain knowledge about our different cultures, faiths, and ways of life, why are we not doing so? With knowledge and understanding of our different cultures and lifestyles, we could communicate, carry on dialogue, and negotiate some sort of settlement between our differences.

I think this needs compromises; conflict resolution needs compromises in order to resolve.

This so-called resolution of conflict by war has not and will not resolve a thing. War is a destruction of the opportunity to solve our conflicts peacefully and intelligently.

"The liberation of Kuwait has begun," the radio news said on January 16 after 7:00 in the evening. And I thought that the killing and destruction of many productive men, women, and children in Baghdad and of America has begun. Oh yes, this is certainly progress.

Why do we as a country not have real visions for the future, or a leader with vision? Whatever the effects of this war maybe, there certainly don't seem to be visions to truly deal with our many problems in society today. There does not seem to be any visions for attempting to solve peace and justice issues in the United States or globally. War is a destructive, shallow and short attempt to end or solve a problem.

When will we learn to truly communicate and resolve our conflicts through verbal communication, dialogue and compromise? Sooner or later. Conflict resolution occurs in this way, I believe.

"Sooner or later, all the people of the world will have to discover a way to live in peace... if this is to be achieved, we must evolve for all human conflict a method which rejects revenge, aggression, and retaliation." -Martin Luther King, Jr. Nobel Speech, 1964.

Friend's letter con'd

if you would like to discuss this with me.

I've been watching ABC's program, "A Line in the Sand: War or Peace." Of course it is scary to think about going to war, but one (me) cannot dwell on it. I've got people counting on me to do my job and return home. Once you stop and think about what you are doing, concentration is lost and that would be unwise. All of our lives are about to be changed, and not all of us are ready.

As I have said, "life goes on."

I AM RETURNING, just keep that in your heart and mind, and it will happen.

I have not said how I feel about this. I just gave you some insight. If you would like to know more, write me. By the way C.D., I am giving you permission to talk about what you saw. Maybe it will help my friends understand me a little more.

It seems that I have complained about something in each of my letters. I express myself better in writing. I just let my mind wander and get on a roll, and it's hard to stop. I'm just expressing my feelings since I can't be there in person. This will have to do.

Remember my friends, care about and love you. Each of you has a place in my heart and mind.

DIFFERENT !! UNIQUE !! FILLED SPACE !!

This Entertainment page will be really, really different. For one thing, there is just really not that much entertainment to cover here at grand, old MC, so to fulfill journalistic and deadline duties, this page will be the entertainment in and of itself. ## NEW CONCEPTS

How about the often tried and occasionally true Top Ten List? Made famous by David "Who's in my house?" Letterman, the Top Ten List is a favorite of college's everywhere. This is a college I suppose, so let's give it a whirl. Of course, this is simply a test, and if this virgin voyage is a success, then other lists will simply ooze out to you in the future.

Lots of thought was given to the list, important things are happening all around us, but finally, after lots of sweat and stress, the subject was decided. So, here it is the first Echo Top Ten List of 1991...

Top Ten Things Maryville College Can Do With $22 Million

10. Buy more books that we can't use because the library is closed.
9. Buy some patriot missiles to protect MC from naked UTK aggression.
8. Buy a seat on the next Space Shuttle
7. One word: Shrubbery.
6. Print some more really eye-catching brochures with good-looking blondes on the cover.
5. Another word: Squander.
4. Relocate
3. Cut an MC Aid album with local bands doing all those bad covers of tired old songs.
2. Start a putt-putt franchise.
1. Blow it all on a big party and start all over.

Well, was it good for you? As you might imagine, the possibilities on the campus are limitless. A new list is in the works, but the reaction to this list will be garnered first.

But that is not the only option open to us... there is still lots of the page left to fill with humorous (or for you Monty Python fans, humorous) little ditties. Another entertaining option is an advice column. I've toyed with the idea before, but reaction was mixed, but seeing as how I am the only one here right now, I say let's do it!

The questions could be about anything, anyone, you name it. Some serious, while other's could be bordering on the deranged. Personally, both appeal to me, so let's go through a dry run with both, shall we?

Q: Why is it that all relationships are supposed to start with the guy and girl being "friends" (editor: control yourself gentlemen, I know the "F" word doesn't set well with anyone), but then when the friendship is ready to move on or grow, it suddenly becomes too good to jeopardize by dating?

-a really good friend.

A: The editor is also puzzled by this fact. It seems that the friendship changing is of great concern to many MC females. About the only thing that you can do is to stress that the friendship will not change for the worse, it will only grow as the relationship grows, becoming better and stronger. Then patience is the key. If she is really worth it, it will not kill you to wait until she realizes this. That is my answer. My friends Jim and Evan have some other opinions.

That was the serious one, believe it or not. Now on to something slightly less suicidal.

Q: The MC lifestyle really puzzles me, what's going on at MC?

-daring to be different in Davis

A: Well, Ms. Daring, that is a touchy question. I really don't know what you mean by "lifestyle." I think that there is an identity crisis here, thus that is why there are so many fragmented groups, but being around a few close friends is not really that puzzling. Some advice for those times when you are puzzled would be to play some outlaw music (W&W), sit back, and let them help you make it through the night.

O.K., so the first few questions were not exactly gems, but they were all I had. You can help by sending the Echo the questions that really puzzle you. I can't offer the advice of the Oracle at Delphi, but I won't make any gloomy prophecies full of taboos either. No need to feel shy, everybody wants to know something. So if the idea of an advice column strikes your fancy, hunker down and send me those little questions that are eating at your innards.

But wait, we are not finished. PERSONALS! We attempted them last year, but response soon dwindled. I think they would do wonders for campus communication, so let's see what you think about them. Unless we receive a flood, they would be run free of charge, but nix the profane personals. Sorry. Here's what one could look like.

WANTED: Some one to watch very boring French movies while either sleeping or talking on the portable phone. Desperately in need of sub-titles and a sweetie.

Get the idea. The possibilities are infinite. And the more creative they are, the more likely it is that the personal will be run. So, come on MC, get personal. Sorry, bad pun- I'm prone to such slaughter of the language from time to time.

Any way, here are three possibilities for future entertainment. We will try to judge which ones are your favorites, but if it is not clear the editor will choose, and you know how he is... who can tell what he will do next? So, to keep this momentous decision out of his shaky hands, let us know!

I know, the disappointment probably abounds with this page, but at least I was entertained, that should count for something. I feel that if I reached only one person, affected one smile, or lack thereof, then this page was a success. But, I know the entertainment that you want, but unfortunately, it is not legal in this particular county, so the Echo can't help that.

What we are looking for is something amusing that is legal in this county and on this campus, a hard order, I will grant you, but surely when this many people are put together on a campus, some ideas should flow. Any ideas? I hope so, because I don't know if I can fill up four full columns again. You should try it sometime. I am sure many on the staff would find that particularly entertaining.

But, I digress. The point of all this, you seem surprised that there was a point, is that there has to be something entertaining about MC, something that can be pointed at with the full knowledge that, yes, indeed, that is funny. I searched, and there are many funny, or maybe unsettling is a better word, around the campus. I don't mean that one group of people should find something funny about another group, that seems easy. I am speaking of something that the entire body of students can gather around and chuckle, laugh, or stare at with a shocked expression.

Or maybe there is not. Now that is about as depressing as the economy, the idea that a place with the history of MC not having anything humorous is as shocking as William F. Buckley, Jr. joining the Rainbow Coalition. Look around and laugh, but not too hard.

Absence of tennis concerns editor, others

By John Worth
Echo Sports Editor

"We don't understand"

This, in the words of Michelle Smith, is the general attitude taken by members of the women's tennis teams at MC. Or, rather, former members. This year there is no women's tennis team. No one really knows why.

The athletic department said in an interview earlier this year that there was a lack of budget and interest. According to the players, there is an abundance of interest. Smith stated that she knows of some players who came to MC with the intentions of playing tennis. But they cannot.

Once again it can be seen that there are viable flaws in the athletic department.

How many people have ever thought about this? We have football, basketball, softball, baseball, volleyball, and soccer. Why not tennis? Oh, sure, it is not in the budget. According to Vicki Wester, the only expenses came in the forms of gas to and from schools (few overnight trips), and a 30 dollar stipend for shoes (with only a few players). No uniforms. No home court. The athletic department is where the obvious lack of interest can be found.

And what about those courts? There is a crack (just one?) that runs through the court created by the settling of the surface. It is a labor to climb over it. Anyone who has ever played there knows what it is like. The team has to go to Maryville High School to play and practice. That is probably why there is assumed to be little student support. No one goes to the matches because no one knows where they are! That point aside, the courts are ugly. They are the ugliest part of the campus and cast a poor image of the school. They are the first things that people entering via court street see, and they are a shameful sight in the eyes of many. Instead of redoing the football field and stadium, used only by a relative few for a relatively short period of time, why not build new tennis facilities. This does not simply mean re-doing the present courts; it means adding courts so that the matches played do not last forever (and bear in mind that there are no lights).

Why does the school not care? This is what can be assumed by lack definitive action in this area. The only maintenance done is mowing the grass around the courts. There is honestly more growing inside the fence. And this is a plea not just for the women's team. This is a plea for a possible men's team; it is for the public which comes to the courts to play and conduct classes. The school has allowed its basketball team to flourish, and it has. The football team is looking to exceed all bounds next season. The baseball and soccer teams have new facilities. Albeit that the soccer fields are not great; they are better than the tennis courts.

This is a call for input on this situation. It is true that there are more important things on this campus and in the world, and maybe it is silly to ask this when opinions are needed elsewhere. But the opinions are needed to complete this article. Send comments to the editor of the Highland Echo at box 2181 or to the sports editor at box 2646. An article will appear in the next issue to shed more light on the issue.

T. C. Talks Returns...

Talking about 1991 and MC

This year has already seen the apparent demise of one column, and the resurrection of last year's T.C. Talks may be short lived and possibly ill-timed; however, there are reasons for me stepping outside the restraints and duties of the editor-in-chief position. The first reason, is to reiterate and to redefine some of the more hostilely received columns from last year, the second is to probe further into some of many beliefs last year which have evolved or changed (mutated?), and the last is that something had to go on this last page for the sake of continuity and appearance. It is my hopes that this column will receive the kind of reception that it did last year: it will actually be read!

The first concern of mine is the paper itself. MC, if it truly is the liberal arts institution which it seems, deserves a college press; however, for many years now, the paper has been running on fumes. A skeleton staff continually does the work of two or three times as many people, and somehow, somehow, the college gets its paper. But, why do these people - less than one-half of one per cent of the students - continually put themselves through the trauma of the demon known as Deadline? Surely, it must be the gratitude that is shown them or the positive feedback that they get, something known as psychic income. Wrong! (Thank you for the word, Waylon.) These people not only do the work of many in a short time, but when their work is presented before the community (???), the majority of that community respond with something akin to either a very loud yawn or a very large discharge of gas. And a growing majority respond with the hostility of a playground brawl, lashing out without true provocation in a manner that would land a third grader in the principal's office.

Now, of course, we expect that now some will bow to us in a mock sort of reverence, in disbelief that the students should appreciate or read the paper, yet there seems to be an abundance of grief after the fact, that an event or person was not covered by the meager means of the Echo. Of course, hyperbole is an effective tool of any writer, but this message from the staff is not that out of proportion with the truth. That's what it is all about. The truth, no matter what, when, or who. Last year, some of my statements reflected the truth, and for the first time in a while, people read this paper. I wondered, what I had said that could induce the journalistic equivalent of CPR on a paper that others more devoted, talented, and less cynical than myself had slaved over for years. I still do not know, but in a purely Wilford Brimley-esque vein, "If it ain't broke, don't fix it."

But, I don't like Quaker Oats, and a press not willing to take chances is a stagnant press, so I will try to not really fix this column, but amend or update it. Arise.

I made more than one enemy last year in the business department. How are you folks doing this year? Well, don't worry, you can untie those nooses and put out those torches. I was guilty of mass misinterpretation last year with my many renderings about business. Actually, I was on your side and the side of business in the liberal arts curriculum. What I was prophesizing were national trends, trends toward the vocationalism of the fifties and the specialization that destroys the broad education. I was reporting to the department and the campus the findings of such Carnegie Foundation reports as 50 Hours, yet sadly I appeared ambiguous and unclear, and the tempers flared like a Fourth of July picnic. But I cannot really be upset about the business department, more blunt and coercive attacks have been received this year by others with whom my articles did not settle well. And 1991 is the specified topic of conversation, so having settled my affairs with the business department, I move on to present concerns. Oh boy, are there concerns in 91! Would you like the top ten or the entire list?

The grading policy, student rights (see below), the schedule, Interim, Inquiry, and that favorite topic of mine, the curriculum! Don't get scared, all these issues could not possibly be addressed here, but it must be clear that all are of viable concern to the students and need addressing by someone somewhere. The Academic Life Council (ALC) is presently addressing the schedule and Interim, so the student concerns are being addressed in part. And there are other student bodies that may address some of the other concerns in the near future, so student concerns will not be allowed to grow stagnant as has been the case in the past. And hopefully, the paper will continue to probe problems and provide information about how these problems might be resolved.

But, the question is, does the paper matter? Sure, it is great to see your picture in the Echo and it really accompanies the daily duties well, but does it do what it is meant to do? And if not, what can be done? The staff (and the Advisor) really cannot work any harder, and with mainly negative feedback and the vengeance of many, the staff should not be expected to work any harder. Everything should have a reason for existence, but there comes a time when simply bolstering the resume is not enough?

Pleas and feigned appreciation is not the point, please refrain from those acts. The final question is what kind of paper do you want? Do you want a paper receptive to student opinion, no matter the subject; one that is not reluctant to tackle issues that matter, or do you want the equivalent of the Avon lady making that bi-weekly call to your P.O. box rehashing jargon that you already hear all too often anyway? The choice is yours, and failure to act is decision enough for all of us. The sunset calls, and the Echo is saddled up.

Student rights wronged in judicial process: editorial

by T.T. Crabtree
Echo Editor-in-Chief

The People's Republic of China, South Africa, Maryville College... ironically, there are tragic similarities between all three. China and South Africa have long been infamous for their denial and violations of human rights. MC is guilty of violating the accorded rights of its students, and on a campus of this size, the odds are far greater that next time, it might be your rights which are discarded.

Alarming enough, it was in the midst of the highest judicial body on campus (the Campus Judicial Board) that the rights and stated privileges of MC students were overriden in the hunt for those responsible for embarrassing the college. It seems, however, that the Judicial Board itself is not to blame; it was merely the vehicle used to rectify the embarrassment.

Of course, the question of the incident arises; however, the incident, itself, is not the great concern. The concern lies in the manner in which the arms of the administration dealt with the situation, and the resulting verdict in the process of rights violation.

The violating culprit does not seem to enjoy a physical embodiment, if it did it would be much easier to combat and to neutralize before more fall victim to it. It is attitude, and pre-conception by many. It is the belief that MC students are constantly questioning, confronting, and defying the power of the administration and the effectiveness of that administration. Simply, it is a hegemony of paranoia and power that seems to go unchecked because there is no checking device available to the students except an appeal to the same vehicle which originally discarded their rights.

In this process, the rights at issue are found in the Student Handbook: that students charged with any violations which will be heard by the Judicial Board will be notified within ten days after the event. When no notification comes, except a subpoena to attend the trial, and when the Judicial Board, itself, does not know whom the administration is trying until minutes before the commencement of the trial, rights are unquestionably being violated; furthermore, the process of the violation seems less severe when many rights are sacrificed. If enough students fall prey, the severity seems milder since many share the violation, and the group leaves unaware of the travesty of justice perpetrated upon them, and even the accuser seems pleased since many shared the same fate.

The guilt or innocence of those involved in the trial, while the paramount focus of the Judicial Board, is not the paramount focus of this investigation. We are accorded rights, and the validity of those rights, when printed and distributed (as was the Student Handbook) seems assured. The focus is the process which does not abide by the rules it gives itself.

The question that arises after the issue that rights were clearly overlooked is which rights, which the students seemingly enjoy, will be suspended when the college is again embarrassed. The precedent has now been set: if the college's objective is impeded by its own set of rules and guidelines, those rules may be set aside to achieve the college's desired end. Granted, that MC will employ no tanks as did China nor will it massacre those involved in protest (at least this editor hopes so), but the violation of rights is a severe sign that does not need tanks or bullets to cause distress among the affected populace: the MC student body.

This editorial is poised for mass misinterpretation and wrongful reaction, but let it be clear that it is neither the Campus Judicial Board nor the Office Of Student Development which bring condemnation. It is this prevailing attitude toward the student body and its leaders which is to be blamed. The solution is not clear, but when more than a few realize that such a problem indeed does exist, the probability of a rational solution increases. The more heads that tackle this problem does nothing but increase the possibility for an ample solution to be achieved. Also, it informs the students to be alert and cautions them that such an occurrence might soon affect them as well.

The rights of any students are precious not only to the students, but also to the administration because it is only in an environment of trust and confidence in leadership, that the education may exist.

Student Senate approves charter of pro-life group, opposes suggested changes in Interim

by Kathleen McArthur &
Echo Staff

The Student Senate passed a proposed charter for a pro-life organization and strongly opposed suggested changes in the interim term at the Feb. 7 meeting in CCM.

The charter for a pro-life organization called Tennessee Students for Life, sponsored by Landon Harris, was introduced by Laura Field. Senators at first expressed concerns that the student body would feel that the Senate was endorsing the controversial organization, but when Senate President Chris Varner insisted that the senate vote on the technical content of the charter, the measure passed.

The Academic Life Council reported that changes for the interim term are currently being discussed. The main change would involve dropping the winter interim and using the spring term—usually in May—for all interim courses. This change would also involve beginning the fall semester before Labor Day and beginning the spring semester earlier in January. The discussion that followed revealed strong opposition in the senate to such changes. Further discussion is expected at the next senate meeting.

In other business, the senate reviewed a draft of election guidelines presented by the election committee; Varner reported on his meeting with John Radcliff, regional vice president of Marriott, on a new contract and announced changes in the Student Programming Board and in the communicable illness policy; the Athletic Committee announced a date for a question/answer session; faculty representative Dave Vinson was questioned about the new grading

Community Forum resumes with a "Big Bang"

by Jeff Huffman
Ass't Editor

The first of a series of community forums for this spring semester entitled "Origins" was presented the seventh of February by Dr. Robert Naylor, Professor and Chair of the Department of Biology and Chemistry at M.C. Naylor began this Community Forum session on the cosmic cause of our origins. He conducted his speech with a slide projector relating the age of the known universe and its beginnings to his narrative. He described the search for our past as an exploration of the cosmos itself, as well as a delving into the atomic microcosm.

The "library of life", as Naylor referred to it, lies within the cells of all creatures. Every atom that partakes of our being is older than the Earth itself. Naylor noted how science digs for this evidence in quark-producing super-colliders which smash atoms into each other.

He said "everything you see is in the past", referring to the examples of the sun's light being eight minutes old when we register it to our vision or Neptune's having a four hour old apparition. This time-vision can be observed as far as the farthest galaxy, quoted by Naylor as being 12 billion light years into the past.

He reasoned that we exist because we're thinking about ourselves existing.

Naylor outlined ten characteristics of everything: Out of all possible outcomes, our universe has developed in the one way we know it now. Everything is made up of the fundamental particles wherein there are six types of quarks and six types of leptons. There are four main forces - gravitational, electromagnetic, weak nuclear, and strong nuclear. There are four BIG dimensions which are increasing in size. Magnetic monopoles are exceedingly rare. There is extremely uniform microwave radiation permeating the universe. The universal large-scale structure is not uniform

From the Editor...

On the importance of communication

February 7th at the student senate meeting Travis Crabtree announced his resignation as editor of the Highland Echo. As a last hurrah at this school that has given me much, I have taken up the reigns of editorship at the Echo in the place of my respected colleague.

Those of you with whom I have eaten dinner may remember me in association with one of my favorite topics-people don't talk! Sure we talk, but do people really say what's on their minds? And when they do talk, are they truly saying what they mean, or are they just saying what they think you want to hear, or in the case of the contentious, what they think you don't want to hear?! Either way, people aren't expressing themselves, and I think it doesn't have to be that way.

I believe that communication is important, both for personal and community development. I believe that at a school as small as MC the newspaper can be an excellent medium by which we communicate and get to know each other. Simply stated, this is my goal as editor. I want to hear what's on your minds: students, faculty and staff. Talk to me! If you like, call me at home at 983-1785 (before 11:00 PM), or leave a message in P.O. Box 2379. I would also like to initiate the Highland Echo Forum, an informal gathering with interested students in which they can speak their mind freely and without fear of criticism. Look for announcements of this in the post office and elsewhere.

Love, liberty, the pursuit of happiness? What are your thoughts? Talk to me!

T.C. Talks...

Explanations and advice to you

Resignation. It sounds so final. Well, it is, and it isn't. The reason that I resigned from the editorship of the Echo was that I deemed the paper was not being received well under me. In short, I thought that turning the paper over to others was the best thing I could do... for the paper. The best thing for me is irrelevant.

Now, the reasons that I thought the paper was not being received well under me. Do you want the top ten or the whole list? How's threats from staff members, slanders from students, misinterpretation from everyone who even glanced at my articles, and childish rebuttals to my articles which were off base by a mile, violations of my and other's rights. Had enough? I did. It was a tough road to travel, but it was worth it. Frankly, I did not want to resign, and I definitely don't want to stop writing for this paper; therefore, that is why my resignation is not the terminal point that I know many of you had hoped it would be.

T.C. Talks will continue. I will be breaking new ground, digging up old bones, burying hatchets, and all types of other journalistic excavations I know you will love (or I will at least). Look for top ten lists, questions and answers, and other things which the Interim issue set the precedent for.

Now, let's get on with something that distresses me to no end. Slavery. Yep, it is alive and well in these so-called modern times. But before I get everyone flustered over this, let me qualify the slavery of which I am talking. Slavery to the system. Slavery to what we are supposed to be under the status quo. Slavery to practicality. Everyone is besieged by what they are supposed to do, that what they want to do is stifled. Unhappiness festers; competitiveness flows; a dog eats another dog; and, boom, we have the world that we live in today.

Echo Question...*What is your opinion of the censorship of the media in the Persian Gulf ?

It is common practice during war.
I think it is necessary.

Mark Koerber, Alumnus

During military action it is fine.

It helps save our troops.

Nikki Margetin, Fr.

I think it is necessary to prevent information from getting into the wrong hands.

Alicia Hunter, So. and Krista
Loy, Jr.

I think they should because someone could sit in Baghdad, watch a live news report and see where we are.

David Kirby, Fr.

They should censor the news. I think they know too much already.

Kari Gregory, Jr.

I think we need a certain amount of it because we can't maintain tactics if they know what we are going to do.

Marion Thomson, Jr.

I think we need a certain amount of it to protect our men and women over there.

Lori Chambers, Sr.

I think it is a good idea. If it was not controlled the media would not be restrained. I don't want to turn on the TV and see dead bodies.

Rob Riehl, So.

I think it is bulls__t because I think that they don't want people to know what war is like. They don't want this to be an unpopular war like Viet Nam. When people see all the killing it will become unpopular.

Krista Ross-Mull, Jr.

I feel it is unjust. If they are going to tell us, then tell us everything. They are giving the Americans a false sense of hope.

Bert Jordon, Jr.

Could start a panic. It could feed information to the enemy that could be dangerous to us.

LETTERS...

Dear Editor,

After reading the January 25th edition of the Echo, I was extremely disappointed. The "T.C. Talks Returns..." was an example of the propaganda which I am distressed about. In this column the "Editor-In-Chief" describes the community reception of the Echo as equivalent to a repulsive bodily function. This may be true, however, this type of approach to the problem is a far cry from a possible solution. I found the entire edition of the paper to have a rather large cynical note to it. I believe that rather than complaining about the student body and boasting about how much work the few supporters of the paper do, it would be better to approach the situation similar to this, "The Highland Echo is in need of people who would like to help the college and student body to constantly improve the atmosphere of the community by writing quality articles and columns. The Echo needs people who are committed to honest journalism. If you are interested, please contact the Echo."

The image of the paper needs to be improved. As I see it, the majority of the information presented in the Echo are the personal views and opinions of one person. Why would people support the presentation of views and opinions that they do not agree with? If the paper would print things that are of real concern to students, they might support it better.

And what about quality journalism? Quite frankly, the quality of journalism at the Echo sucks. Even in the most recent issue, accusations were thrown at the Campus Judicial Board and student development office, however, not one piece of evidence was presented to support his claim of violated rights. Since I am disturbed by his lack of support for his claims, I will provide some support for my claim.

Case in point. Recently, there was an editorial by T.T. Crabtree

see LETTER p. 4

Another viewpoint on America's involvement in the Gulf War

by Missy Flaherty
Ass't Editor

First and foremost...the evening the first bombs were dropped in Iraq my heart fell. I had that deep down feeling of dread and despair. The feelings were for all soldiers, all families, ALL human beings connected with this desperation we call war. I don't think there are any of us that want to be in his kind of conflict...but, we are.

I support the cause, I support our president, and I support the men and women fighting for our country. Why? Let me give you a simplistic example.

I was in the park one day playing with some of my friends. We were all doing our own thing. Some of us were playing marbles, some jumping rope, and some playing baseball. One little boy had a lemonade stand. We enjoyed buying lemonade from him, especially when we were thirsty. Well, along comes this big bully and decides that he wants the little boy's lemonade stand. Before anyone could do anything about it the bully had pushed the little boy out and made the lemonade stand his own. Now bleeding, banged up, and wanting his lemonade stand back, the little boy cried for help. My friends and I wanted to help the little boy. We talked to the bully, we tried to tell him that what he did was not nice. He didn't care. We didn't buy any lemonade and asked the other kids in the park not to buy any either. The bully didn't care about that either because he said "...there would be other kids who would get thirsty and buy his lemonade, and if they didn't, he'd drink it all by himself."

After we tried everything to get the bully to give the little boy's lemonade stand back we realized that the only thing the bully understood was the means by which he took the lemonade stand in the first place. We didn't want to hurt him, or the little boy's lemonade stand for that matter, but

"February Meetings"

by Michelle Hall
Echo Staff

The 1991 February Meetings will be held Tuesday, February 19 through Thursday, February 21. The theme for this year's Meetings is "Cosmology and Theology: Conflict or Convergence?" Dr. Robert John Russell will be the keynote speaker for the Meetings.

Russell will address the community at 11:00 a.m. each day in the Fine Arts Center. Tuesday his lecture will be "Science and Religion: Conflict or Convergence?", Wednesday "Cosmos and Creation: Towards a Fruitful Interaction", and Thursday "Life in the Universe: From Creation to New Creation." Dean Boldon has agreed to suspend 11:00 a.m. classes on Wednesday, and Community Forum credit will be given for attendance at any two of the three lectures.

Russell will hold an Open Dialogue with students at 5:30 p.m. on Tuesday in Pearson's Dining Hall. He will also meet with religion classes and science students. In addition, Russell will be available on Wednesday and Thursday afternoons for class presentations at the request of the teacher.

This year's program personality for February Meetings will be Dr. Dick Austin. Austin will speak Wednesday on "Religious Awareness of Natural Life" at 9:00 a.m., on "Biblical Faith and Environmental Crisis" at 4:00 p.m., and on "New Heaven, New Earth" at 7:30 p.m. All three lectures will be given in the Center for Campus Ministry. Austin will also be available for class presentations on Wednesday afternoon.

Russell is an ordained minister in the United Church of Christ, Congregational. He is an associate professor of theology and science at the Graduate Theological Union in Berkeley, California. He holds a Ph.D. in physics from the University of California, Santa Cruz and an M.A. in theology from the Pacific School of Religion, Berkeley.

Austin received his B.A. from Swarthmore College, his M.Div. from Union Theological Seminary in New York City, and his doctorate in the science of theology from San Francisco Theological Seminary.

After a decade as a pastor in Appalachia with the Holston Presbytery of the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.), Austin became a national leader of efforts to control strip mining and to promote energy conservation. In addition to his environmental ministry, Austin tends an organic farm in the southwestern Virginia mountains where he lives.

entitled "A House Divided." In this editorial, the "Editor-In-Chief" made claims about the injustices of the Athletic Department and stated that the Athletic Review Committee would be the place to complain about these injustices. However, when writing this editorial, a rather important part of good journalism was overlooked. No one bothered to interview anyone from the Athletic Department or the Athletic Review Committee. The editorial was based solely on rumors and the personal misinterpretations of the editor. This is not quality journalism. This is one individual who, by his own words, is "cynical" and is using his position with the paper to further his own personal opinions without regard to the truth or the concerns of the college community. Given this situation, it is not very surprising that support for the paper is diminishing.

Sincerely,

We look to what will happen after MC or after grad school, but we don't seem to consider that what we do now actually undermines our grand dreams of becoming vastly wealthy, incredibly happy, and the owner of a really fast sports car. Unhappiness must be faced now. An MBA will not do diddly-squat except bring more money so we can try to forget about why we are so unhappy. The cycle begins; it perpetuates, and it destroys.

What are we to do? How can we save ourselves, O wise one? Well, don't look at me. I too am victim to this mortal cycle. I too am trying to break out of the cycle. I came to college to break out of a mold, not to be cast into a titanium one.

But, I do have some advice. Look to something which you have been postponing until after grad school. It can be anything. Then ask yourself why you are doing it, and if you are the only one being sacrificed by this prayer to the god of practicality? We often take others down Unhappiness Lane unsuspectingly. Then once this process of analyzation is over, is it still worth postponing? If it is, at least the precedent has been set, and the next time you say, "Oh, I will be ready for that after grad school," you may analyze it just as you have done with this.

I know this sounds corny-no, what is that word-oh yes, cheesy. Also, I have a slight confession to make, this has been aimed at a few individuals rather than the entire student body. But, as a columnist, I feel I have a distinct duty to appeal to isolated individuals, such as commuters, who are sometimes overlooked by the rest of the paper.

Think about what I have written because the next column is on the way.

MLK III speaks at MC

by Jeff Huffman
Ass't Editor

On January 19, Martin Luther King III, son of the late Martin Luther King, Jr., spoke and dined at a celebration banquet in Pearson's Hall. The banquet was given in honor of King, Jr.'s sixty-second birthday anniversary and the sixth national observance of the birthday of the civil rights activist. His father initiated the civil rights movement which brought more freedom to the minorities of the 60's. The word "minorities" means "less than", which King pointed out as a sign of the still evident racism infecting today's society.

King noted the "new" war. "How can you feel GOOD about dropping a bomb on people?" King established his views, which his father adopted from Ghandi, to the American psyche: Nonaggressive, peaceful means are the most sensible course of resolving the current conflict responsible for the implementation of nearly half a million American men and women into a potentially disastrous outcome, oiling of the Persian Gulf, and renewed inner American conflicts.

King addressed the crowd of the local community and the MC faculty, staff and students, "Isn't it funny how we suddenly found the money for war?" He pointed to the lack of domestic dollars in conjunction with the recent boom of military spending.

The domestic situation, King noted, was at "epidemic levels" with the major emphasis on the American education system. King said there should be "a minimum of three additional languages" required with an invigorated regimen on learning more about the Eastern, Asian, African, and African-American cultures.

King spoke of how the U.S. government builds "not smart minds, (but) smart missiles." A poster of Martin Luther King Jr.'s speaking image staring at the words "The Dream is Alive" apportioned a segment of wall to King's right as he said that the United States of America "is a good country, but it could be a great country!" King ended by saying that the past is our heritage, the present is our responsibility, and the future is our challenge.

King was born in Montgomery, Alabama the second oldest of Reverend Martin Luther King Jr. and Coretta Scott King's four children. During the 1970's King officially represented President Jimmy Carter in promoting peace. As a member of The Martin Luther King, Jr. Center For Nonviolent Social Change, King was involved in a fact-gathering tour of impoverished and drought-stricken African nations in 1984 which helped establish the solution providing African Initiative.

King has served as a fundraiser for The King Center, as a public relations official, and as vice president and director of youth programs. He successfully lobbied for his father's birthday, January 15, to be recognized as a national holiday. King is now an elected commissioner-at-large in Fulton County Georgia.

Television

by John Worth
Entertainment Editor

Some of you may have noticed an oddity about normal Sunday night television on Fox. It is a show that would have to be the funniest and most unique show on television...ever. Some of you will be way ahead of me on this.

The scene is set: a simple family trip to the carnival to relieve all the stresses that come from being a full-time paperboy. The characters get on the rollercoaster and ride time after time, making endless back-to-back trips. And then, on what they agree will be their last trip, they get stuck upside down. Okay, it is not filled with suspense nor is it bathed in mind-chilling action. But it is funny... depending, of course, on your definition of the word.

What is this pinnacle of television production? Who is the dashing main character? The show is Get a Life; the main character is Chris Peterson, a 30 year old paperboy who lives in the "bachelor pad" above his parents garage. And yes, it is stupid. But that is precisely what makes the show fun.

For nearly nine months now this show has been airing Sundays on Fox, taking a good share of the ratings for the night. It comes after In Living Color (a sad disappointment of late) at 8:30, the perfect time of night for a study break. Even if viewers do not become reminiscent of the Trekkies that know every word by heart, it should, on occasion, provide a few good laughs. Even the most cynical of people will find amusement in the concept, and should laugh at some point during the show. But be forewarned: it is a really dumb show. It should not be watched in order to find serious comedy. It is merely a relief from the dullness of Cosbyesque humor, dealing with every day people and things. Get a Life takes the reality out of the show and presents the public with a show that is nothing like anything they have ever done...but somewhat reminiscent of something that maybe they did a long time ago. The family reunion episode is a good example of this. Sure, few people have ever had a rival family member attempt suicide because of humiliation created by another, but everyone knows the boring reality of sitting around and eating a bunch of strange food that is of questionable origin.

The recommendation here is to watch the show. If you like it, watch it next week; if you don't, you broke up your Sunday night routine to try something new, a concept virtually unheard of to some people. But at least it has a cool theme song that can be appreciated for its originality: Stand by REM.

Good day and happy viewing.

MC basketball program contributes heavily to winning tradition

by Don Evon
Echo Sports Editor

During the past couple of years, the Maryville College athletic program has increasingly improved its ability to give us, the students (and probably the members of the Maryville community as well), a reason to be proud of our teams. Since Christmas, it has been the mens' and womens' basketball teams that have proven that they too have a considerable amount to contribute to the establishment of a winning tradition at Maryville College.

For those of you who remain unaware of the success of the '90-'91 basketball program (and even for those of you who are aware), please allow me to briefly summarize some of the major accomplishments of these two teams up to this point.

Upon returning from the Christmas break, both teams quickly resumed their quest for a national tournament bid. After winning a weekend tournament at home, on January 4th and 5th (before most students were even back for interim), the mens' club went on to extend an existing winning streak to 12 games by defeating teams such as Centre (92-76), Bryan (87-79), Stillman (79-71 and 88-85), Rust (79-74), and Oglethorpe (86-74). Since the winning streak was called to a halt by Knoxville College (NAIA), the Scots have recovered by destroying DeVry (116-67) and by overpowering both Sewanee and Oglethorpe (again), since the month began.

Besides a 12-game winning streak, elements such as tenacious defense, clutch free-throw shooting, trademark scoring flurries, and lethal three-point shooting, have advanced the mens' team to #20 in the nation among Division III schools. In addition, the men are ranked fourth in the nation from three-point land, averaging 9.4 three-point baskets per game (North Carolina State leads Division I with 9.7).

Sophomore transfer Kelvin Richardson leads the team in scoring, although Jesse Robinette has tallied the most points from three-point range. Without a doubt, the club's success has been the result of a total, team effort in which everyone has contributed, and other standouts so far this season have included Kenyon Lacy, Tim Lawrence, and Babatu Willingham. The Scots are now 17-3 on the season (as of February 12th).

Junior Rodney Lane goes for two as the men's basketball team moves closer to a national tournament bid.

The womens' team has been equally impressive. Since January 6th, the Lady Scots have improved their record to 19-3, thrashing teams such as Shorter, Rust, Rhodes, Piedmont, Berea, Sewanee, and Fisk, thanks to some outstanding offensive efforts. Soled defense has also contributed to victories over Greensboro and the highly regarded Centre team. The Lady Scots are currently ranked #1 in the South and #7 in the nation. Leah Onks is the leading scorer for the womens' team, while Sherri Daigle, Cindy Huffaker, Lisa Locke, and Lanai Ballard have also contributed heavily.

So, here's to the Maryville College basketball program: congratulations, good luck in your post-season games, and thanks for another two teams to take pride in.

Lady Scot Softballers ready themselves for a season of competition and promise

by Laquita Gernt
Echo Staff

The Maryville College Lady Scots softball team has begun its 1991 season practice.

Facing a hard schedule, Coach Kandy Schram says the Lady Scots will be relying on strong defense and pitching to lead them to a winning season.

Although small in number, the team lacks nothing in enthusiasm and positive attitude. As freshman Nikki Boop says, "if we play the best we can, there should be no problem."

The Lady Scots will scrimmage Hiwassee College on Feb. 23 and host their first regular season game on March 4 against Carson Newman College.

policy; and Travis Crabtree announced his resignation from the editorship of the Highland Echo.

Varner asked senators to note any desired changes in the draft of guidelines presented by the election committee and to bring them up at the next meeting. One proposed change is to schedule the election for president of the senate at an earlier date and to allow those candidates who run for president to also run for other positions after they have been defeated in the presidential election.

In his meeting with Marriott's Radcliff, Varner said that he told Radcliff that students were pleased with the new manager on campus, Kevin Collins, and asked the senate for patience as problems are being worked out.

Varner also announced that Sharon Linginfelter will be working with the Student Programming Board, and that the college's communicable illness policy includes several changes that need to be discussed at the next meeting.

The Athletic Committee, formed to deal with problems concerning scheduling as an NCAA Division III Independent and the possibility of joining a conference, will hold a question/answer session on Feb. 13 (place to be announced) for students to express concerns and views on where the MC athletic program is headed or should be headed.

Senate Faculty Representative Dave Vinson asked the senate to voice their concerns about the new plus/minus grading policy. Vinson said he is compiling a statistical analysis of grades from last semester in order to determine if grade point averages are being adversely or favorably affected by the change.

The meeting ended with the resignation of Highland Echo Editor Travis Crabtree, who said that a lack of support and constructive criticism for the Echo among faculty, staff, and students made it impossible for him to continue to edit the newspaper.

Meetings bring science and religion together

by Michelle Hall
Echo Staff Writer

The 114th annual February Meetings were held Tuesday, February 19 through Thursday, February 21. The theme for this year's Meetings was "Cosmology and Theology: Conflict or Convergence?"

February Meetings were started a decade before the Civil War by the first Maryville College president, Isaac Anderson, in conjunction with New Providence Presbyterian Church in Maryville. Out of the Meetings came the first college-based YMCA in the South and the second Dismas House in the South. In a series of lectures, keynote speaker Dr. Robert John Russell discussed whether science and religion are moving closer together or further apart.

Tuesday morning, Russell spoke on "Science and Religion: Conflict or Convergence?" Sue Wyatt, Vice President for Student Life, spoke briefly on the history of the Meetings and read scripture from Isaiah 55:8-9 and Proverbs 8:22. Dr. Terry Bunde introduced Russell.

Russell discussed the two main views that science and religion usually fall into, "conflict" or the "two worlds" view. He separated those in the conflict arena into two communities, "scientific materialism", those who believe that seeing is believing, and "biblical literalism", those who see the Bible as an absolute authority. Some people believe "you can't be a Christian and believe in science," he said.

Russell said he did not see the two as mutually exclusive.

Those subscribing to the "two worlds" concept argue that science and religion are completely different and cannot converge. Advocates of this idea argue that science deals with facts based on data and religion with values based on history, he said. Again, Russell saw a convergence between the two. Both are based on ideas that have weathered the test of time, he said, adding that science

What do Vivian North, Kevin Sumner, and former president Jimmy Carter have in common? They are all part of Habitat for Humanity. Vivian North says, "Habitat for Humanity is an international organization whose goal is to eliminate homelessness one house at a time. Here at MC we are trying to raise the student's awareness of Habitat's goal." These homes are not just given away. The people who will live in them have to take out a loan. They must also donate a set number of hours to helping Habitat build other houses. This is true not just in this country but also in all other countries where Habitat goes.

This summer a group from MC will be going to Nicaragua for two weeks in June. Each group, or team, consists of at the most 10 people. Our team will consist of Maria Mena, Dave Perez, Beth Stevenson, Kerriann Terwedow, Gayle Bieber, Vivian North, Perry North, Rita Moore, Kevin Sumner, and Dr. Elizabeth Perez-Riley. Three of the group know how to speak Spanish. This will make it easier to communicate with the people of Nicaragua. This trip has been recently approved as an interim. The participant will read a text, "A Brief History of Central America", keep a journal of activities and personal reflections, and do other projects to receive credit. They meet once a month for training to go into another country, another culture. This will be a very busy interim.

Our team will be traveling with a team from Knoxville. They will be going to Jinotego and Esquipulas. These towns are near Managua, the capital of Nicaragua, and other population centers. The team from MC will spend one week at one town, go to a retreat on the weekend, and go to the other town for the other week. That way they will get the feel of both communities.

Mike Stevens is the coordinator for the Knoxville team. Stevens has been down in Nicaragua for Habitat before now. He says that the atmosphere is not as anti-American as we see on the news. "The Nicaraguans are able to separate the politics from the people," says North. Mena, who was born in Nicaragua says, "If the government didn't want you there,

The War Is Over?

"Yahoo! The Cold War is over! Japan and Germany win!"

The Iraqi army is getting out of Kuwait—fast. Saddam Hussein has had many strong words for the U.S. and its allies in the Gulf. The past few days the news reports have it that the allied forces are routing his troops and if he wants to open his mouth right now, it's probably to eat crow.

In less than two months the Allied forces, largely made up of Americans, have scored an almost unbelievable victory. Going against an experienced, well equipped, 'Death or Glory' Iraqi army, the Allies not only have just about completely had their way, but they have done it with an incredibly low number of casualties to their own forces. There can be little doubt that the high-tech U.S. military is one of the mightiest the world has ever known.

So maybe the U.S. involvement in the Gulf War really was a good thing after all. The stigma of Vietnam is gone. American military invincibility and pride are restored, and they are once again respected and feared throughout the world. "Don't Mess With The U.S.," the bumper stickers read.

Americans, especially the future leaders here at Maryville College, need to ask themselves a very basic question, however; they need to ask themselves to what end is this incredible military might useful? As the stars and stripes wave from more and more car antennae, Americans must not lose sight of the other problems that plague the country: the S & L crisis, a declining educational system, a trillion-plus dollar national debt that must be paid, etc...

And is it not entirely possible that one of the main reasons for putting on this fireworks show in the Middle East is to distract the nation and the world from the looming speculation that America is no longer the hegemonic power it once was? For almost fifty years the U.S., operating in the economic vacuum left in the wake of World War II, has been expending enormous resources on arms buildup during the Cold War years. During this same time other future powers were arming themselves for a different kind of war: an economic one. Certainly the U.S. military is a technological wonder, but so too are the Sony CD players that seem to be popping up everywhere. Which one is more profitable? Spend some time in the pages of the Wall Street Journal for the answer to that one.

Americans—even many of the courageous, open-minded ones here at MC—are incredibly resistant to dealing realistically with its declining position in the world and its misguided foreign and domestic policy. A country on the edge of a recession does not want to spend billions of dollars that it doesn't have for fighting someone else's war in a far away country, does it? It's time Americans to stop pretending to be John Wayne and get back to work.

The Echo believes that America was and is one of the greatest countries the world. It believes that the U.S. will continue to be great only by recognizing the changes in world power structures and adapting itself to the changes. The age of 'Might makes Right' is coming to a close. It's time to fight a new war with the weapons that make America truly great: adaptability and hard work.

Developing Community, at Home and Abroad

I am writing concerning the International Club Dinner held February 23. I participated in preparing one of the dishes and attended the dinner, which I feel was a great success. However, something about the dinner troubled me. I felt that the amount of food being prepared was entirely too much. I questioned several other students in the club about this concern and they agreed with me. I was told that this was the amount Mr. Hutchens, the coordinator, felt was appropriate and that he could not be persuaded to change his mind.

I think perhaps he failed to realize that the portions he had designated (25 lbs. of pasta, 40 lbs. of lamb, etc.) would be appropriate if they were the only dishes; however, the dinner was a buffet made up of several dishes. The night of the dinner there was plenty of food—enough for seconds or even thirds on some dishes—but this was not announced and so the food was not eaten. At the end of the dinner I know there were seven cafeteria-sized pans of pasta, five pans of lamb, and one pan of vegetables.

Another student working on this event was very concerned about where the food would go. She suggested taking it to a homeless shelter as a donation from the college. However, Mr. Hutchens was not at all cooperative. He said the students could take as much as they wanted in 15 minutes, then the rest was going to be thrown away. When we suggested taking the cafeteria's pans and the food was already in, or waiting until the morning to have time to find a place to take and/or store the food, the answer received was an irate "NO."

Another student begged for some more time to round up international constantly changes through research and religion through reformation.

Wednesday, Russell spoke on "Cosmos and Creation: Towards a Fruitful Interaction." Eileen Freund read the opening scripture from Colossians 1:15-20.

Russell discussed doctrines of creation in light of the Big Bang theory and Quantum Physics. After an overview of the historical perspective of creation from the Medieval period to the 20th century, he discussed Special Relativity and General Relativity and their introduction earlier this century. Einstein changed his scientific views to sync with his religious views, Russell said.

The introduction of Big Bang astronomy in the 1960's, he said, conflicted with the Christian idea of a finite universe. He suggested a convergence of Big Bang cosmology and Creation with the idea of God as the creator of conditions that allow for the possibility of life.

Russell briefly explained Quantum Physics, the idea that nature produces both wave-like and particle-like properties. "Nature," he said "is driven by randomness but not dominated by it." He described nature as "gossamer-like," gently connected in seemingly random ways. God creates these chance processes that make order possible, he said.

Thursday, Russell spoke on "Life in the Universe: From Creation to New Creation." After an introduction by Sue Wyatt, Dr. Jim Bloy played the Organ Prelude. The Call to Worship by Dr. Harry Howard was followed by a hymn. Jamie Harrison read from Revelation 21:1-6a.

Russell briefly explained thermodynamics. "We live off of the dying energy of the sun," he said. Thermodynamics supports the idea that disorder produces order, he said.

Russell went on to talk about Darwinian evolution. Again, he would be interested in more information on any of these projects, you can call Vivian North at 8413. "All donations are readily welcomed," says North.

The students have been told to take very few personal items and to take what they would not mind leaving behind. They may want to give their clothes to someone before they leave. Also, the other space left by taking just the essentials will be used to take over-the-counter medical supplies such as bandages and aspirin, and other supplies such as power tools.

North says, "It starts out as a big brother going to help little sister, with big brother having many preconceived ideas, but they come back much changed. We are hoping MC as a community will rally around and send us off across the borders as an extension of this community. We have not abandoned the Knoxville area, but as a liberal arts college we are trying to round out the students education by showing them another culture."

MC's Habitat organization is trying to work out a schedule with the Knoxville group so they can work together on other projects.

disagreed with the idea that it conflicted with Creation. "Christ," he said, "is an instance of evolution turning around through an extraordinary person."

Concluding with his ideas of a cosmology for our time, Russell saw a "New Creation" on the horizon. He described it as "something which radically remakes what we have now," an instance of convergence between science and theology. This brought to light the opening scripture from Revelation 21:1, "And I saw a new heaven and a new earth: for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away...."

Dr. Dick Austin, program personality for February Meetings, also spoke on Wednesday. He talked about the commitment Christians must bring to environmental ethics in a series of three lectures: "Religious Awareness and Natural Life," "Biblical Faith and Environmental Crisis," and "New Heaven, New Earth."

Cassette tapes of both speakers' lectures are available through Bruce Guillaume at Crawford House.

you couldn't get in the country." The teams will not be near the normal fighting area which is in the southern part of Nicaragua in the jungle.

One of the towns just got electricity this past year. Their first generator was donated by Habitat for Humanity. Both towns do not have running water. The two houses built will have electricity but no indoor plumbing. Our team will be living like the natives of that country.

To be able to go each student must pay his or her own expenses. This will be about $1200 total for the trip and spending money. The team must also raise $1000 for the cost of the house they will be building.

MC's Habitat for Humanity has sold T-shirts and Valentine candy. They are also collecting aluminum cans. If you wish to donate cans, drop them off at Crawford House. Other fund-raisers planned are a Marathon for Habitat, a scholarship competition, a faculty/staff talent night (March 15), a raffle of donated merchandise, and a volleyball tournament sponsored by CCM. # Carnegie construction awaits funding

3.4 million goal; 1.95 million raised to date

by Jana Dalton
Echo Staff Writer

The opening of Carnegie Hall in Fall 1992 hinges on the completion of fund-raising by Fall 1991. Dr. Richard Ferrin said 1.95 million of the 3.4 million has been donated or pledged to date and he feels the vision is proceeding according to its schedule. "I'm excited about it," said Ferrin. "When I talk with students, who are freshmen and sophomores their question is always 'WHEN?'"

Ferrin said it's a valid question and the answer remains tentative until all the funds are accumulated.

The pledges and foundations are marked on an elaborate diagram in Ferrin's office by orange neon dots.

The dots, scattered over the five floors, signify which areas of the building have been financially covered. Therefore, despite the nearness to the 3.4 mil goal, the renovation project is not considered feasible until the whole building has been sponsored. Ferrin said a partial restoration and rushed opening could result in a loss of future pledging in that "it's hard to have a building open and functional and say, 'hey we need more money to finish.'"

Ferrin addressed the high cost of renovation versus construction of a new dormitory. He stated that diligent research and comparisons revealed a new building would cost "$10 a square foot more for the same quality as Carnegie."

Carnegie Hall "houses a host of memories," said Ferrin. And it is precisely that sentimentality which produces the continued gifts.

Alumnus and friends of the college have personal reasons for giving, much like the alum who gave $50,000 over five years for the center fourth floor room because he and his roommates used to throw water balloons from that window. Another patron gave in honor of his brother who was handicapped and has sponsored a suite on the second floor near an elevator.

These warm stories melt into the already colorful past of Carnegie Hall whose residents have gone to extreme measures to keep it alive. When the hall burned in 1916, residents cleaned 80,000 bricks to reduce costs and assist in the restoration.

Today is no exception with the latest donation of $100,000 given by the Arthur Vining Davis Foundations.

The purpose of Carnegie Hall, besides providing additional space and a living option not found in present housing, is to maintain the historical integrity of the campus. One of the 11 oldest buildings on campus and on the National Register of Historic Places, Carnegie represents as a fond reminder of the past for graduates and a reason for present support.

Ferrin also commented on the commitment to improve the existing dormitories. Part of the Beeson endowment is being used to radically upgrade the conditions, as seen in the new roof on Davis. Ferrin also stated that Dr. Wyatt, and others are actively seeking wish lists from students regarding what they consider repair priorities for their dormitories.

Alcoa's history traced in "Blacks in a Company Town"

by Michelle Hall
Echo Staff Writer

In commemoration of Black History Month, the Hall-Oldfield Youth Choir presented the musical "Blacks in a Company Town" at 7:00 p.m. on Sunday, February 24 and Wednesday, February 27 in the Maryville College Fine Arts Theater. The musical, written by Linda Paris Bailey, is based on the essay "The Black Community in a Company Town; Alcoa, Tennessee, 1919-1939" by Robert D. Parker, a former Maryville College history professor, and the oral history of the Hall and Oldfield communities.

The play addresses the struggle of black Alcoa employees and residents for equality in areas such as wages and educational opportunities in the early 1900's when the town had just been incorporated. Recruiters apparently promised an environment that barely resembled the broiling potrooms of the plant where "not even Mexicans would work."

As the play opens Alonzo Rainer, a black recruiter from Bullock County, Alabama who has come to Alcoa to work for the Aluminum Company of America, tells prospective employees of the good wages, hours, homes, and schools that the company and town offer. Rainer, played by Highlan Research Center Intern Eddie Blue, repeatedly mentions the progressive educational ideas of one John T. Arter, played by Steven Latimore of Knoxville.

Arter was the real name of the first principal of Alcoa's black school and a black leader in the early community. Another character, Mr. Hultquist, was also based on a real person. Victor J. Hultquist was the first city manager of Alcoa.

Throughout the play, the young men and women discuss issues such as low wages, integration, and education. Some of them dream of going to Knoxville College or Maryville College or hope their children get to go. Most of the singers are from Alcoa Elementary, Middle, or High school.

The last three scenes, set in the present, deal with the destruction of the Martin Luther King Community Center which was originally the Commercial Building, a center of activity in the early black community of Alcoa. Rainer's grandson, played by Antoine Teeter of Alcoa Elementary, is shown asking Mrs. Rainer, Keri Stewart of Maryville High, why the historic site is to be destroyed. She tells him that it has become an "eyesore," a gathering place for drunks and drug dealers.

In the final scene, the community gathers at the building's ruins to mourn its destruction. The youth decide that rather than recruit for the company like their grandfathers did, they will recruit "for the community."

"Blacks in a Company Town" was directed by Adora Dupree. Trent Gilmore, a graduate of Maryville College, was musical director. Props were designed by Alan Riehl of Maryville College.

students who had not had a chance to eat, or students ordering pizzas in the dorms, in order to offer them some of the food. Again, the answer was "NO."

Finally, some students and I decided to take the initiative ourselves. We could take all the food, but we filled seven buckets full of pasta and sauce and at one in the morning took the food to Knoxville's Rescue Mission.

My main point is that it was sad that it was so difficult to get support after a wonderful dinner meant to bring the world together by expressing the love people should have for one another.

STING BREAKS OUT AND SOARS WITH "SOUL CAGES"

by Jana Dalton
Staff Writer

"If they're surprised then I'm pleased" said Sting in a Rolling Stone interview about his latest album The Soul Cages.

Surprised is the understatement of 1991, especially for this listener who, until now, had barely tolerated Sting's arrogance and only remotely valued his musical talent. It's not that his unique style wasn't intriguing—but often his sounds were brash, his meanings were mysterious and his musical as well as lyrical creations were often repetitive. Let's say he was trendy at best.

Needless to say, there was an objectivity lacking regarding his latest album, The Soul Cages. But it took little time to create such a space and have it quickly overflowing with admiration and awe at Sting's sincere and authentic artistic power.

This masterpiece reveals the heart of Sting and thereby pricks the heart and mind of any listener who contemplates death, life, religion, peace, escaping backgrounds and fleeing to home.

Yet his significance reaches far beyond his personal catharsis (the album was inspired by the death of his parents, and two close comrades). Sting breaks the molds of marketability and Police sound-alikes by delving into musical forms without rhythmic restraints, chord resonance, and the wholeness of supposed-to-sound-connected music.

Using the sea and the river as a dominant lyrical theme based on his earliest memory, Sting also incorporated these images into his music to produce the sound of the ever-changing, powerful surge of water—swirling, waving, constantly amassing and recreating greatness.

"I think everything is a big circle" he said. Life is a concept of "escaping" only to return and "face it" again and again, until in his examination, man comes to see a "deeper religion." The paradox of Sting's philosophy lies in the freedom, through the "deeper religion," from conformity. Sting stated, and it is evident in The Soul Cages, "I look at ritual and inadequacy of ritual in our lives."

Men go crazy in congregations/ But they only get better/ One by One / One by One. This line from "All This Time" summarizes his view of inward revelations serving as the power to affect the world.

"I tried very consciously to break the mold..." he continued in the interview. "I think to bust out of the stereotype is worth doing." But it's may be a relief to know the reason behind the album isn't avant garde for art's (or money's) sake. Rather it is an expression of his own growth and expansion as a human being and conveyed dynamically through his music. "It achieved what I wanted it to achieve in that I feel somehow, I don't know, like I've done the right thing."

I couldn't agree more.

Push Into the MC
Theatre Sceneby John Worth,

There is a new theatre group on campus. A few students, wanting some independence from the school's official theatre department, decided over interim to do some plays, without any official links to the school, but with full backing by Dr. Taddie and the Fine Arts Department. Charlotte Borderieux came up with the idea, and, over interim, decided to make it a reality.

The group is comprised mainly of students from the freshman, sophomore, and junior classes. Most have had experience in the theatre, but it is not a requirement.

The goals of the group are as diverse as its members.

"We want to travel," Borderieux says. "We hope to do a play for adults and one for children. We're doing nursing homes, hospitals, anything that wants us." The first project is "Whatever we can get ahold of," she says.

The official name of the group is LL Vagabonds (the "LL" stands for Loyd Lobby). The group came together because people were interested in theatre. However, Borderieux is the only person in the upcoming MC Theatre production of Stop the World I Want to Get Off.

The group will use no sets and may someday perform original plays, though not at present. The plays chosen are "big puns" with a sense of silliness. The group welcomes any offers to perform.

Look for the productions sometime in the future to come to a location near you, and go support the students of MC.

Lady Scots win Maryville College Invitational soccer tournament

by Don Evon
Echo Sports Editor

Back in December, work had already begun to transform the Maryville College Alumni Gym into a multi-purpose indoor training facility, and since Christmas, it has been used by not only the mens' and womens' soccer teams, but by the softball and baseball teams (the gym now houses an indoor batting cage), by rock climbers (climbing wall), and by a karate class as well. For the weekend of February 16 and 17 however, the gym had been completely converted into an indoor soccer arena, thus providing a location for the First Annual Maryville College Invitational Indoor Soccer Tournament. Because of all of the activities taking place in the gym, practice time was limited during the weeks leading up to the tournament, yet both the mens' and womens' clubs made the best of their late night gatherings and represented the college admirably.

On the 16th (Saturday), four Maryville mens' teams (including one alumni team) hosted a field of 16 other teams including the University of Tennessee, Tusculum, Lindsay-Wilson, Tennessee Temple, and Tennessee Wesleyan, to name a few. After advancing three of their four teams to the quarter-final round, Maryville Red (freshmen) and Maryville White (sophomores and juniors) met in what turned out to be one of the most physical games of the tournament. The only goal of the game came from the foot of Vance Grant about mid-way through the second half, and that was enough to lead the freshmen into the semi-final round. Afterwards, Ben Sohrabi, captain of the Maryville White team, stated, "I should have quickened the tempo of the game right from the start." "We simply played their game," he added later. Ali Sohrabi led the scoring for Maryville White with six goals. Unfortunately, Tusculum defeated the freshman team 3-1 in the next round, thus preventing a Maryville College showdown in the finals. According to Grant, leading scorer of the freshman team with six goals, "the tournament indicated that we're now playing at a level that is a step above where we were when we reported for pre-season back in August." "I think we've improved 100%," he added. Grant also implied that it was good that they had to play a team as strong as Tusculum in the semi's. "Teams like that are the ones that help you improve yourself in the long run," he stated.

Maryville Orange (seniors) had quietly advanced through the top half of the playoff brackets, all the way to the finals and now met Tusculum in the championship match. Although Maryville had defeated Tusculum 1-0 during the outdoor season in the fall, and despite the valiant efforts of Brian Moore, the Maryville team succumbed reluctantly to Tusculum 5-3 in the final match of the evening. In addition to scoring all three goals for his team in the finals, Moore led the tournament in scoring with an incredible 18 goals in seven games. Concerning the tournament in general, Moore implied that the high level of competition present this year should help attract even more teams next year, thus establishing a strong tournament which could become a tradition at Maryville College.

On Sunday, Maryville was represented by two teams in the womens' tournament. Also in attendance were teams from the University of Tennessee-Knoxville, the University of Tennessee-Chattanooga, Tusculum, and Virginia Tech. Again, the two Maryville teams were forced to face each other prior to the final round as Maryville White eliminated Maryville Red 2-0 in the semi-finals. Maryville White went on to defeat UTC 2-1 in the finals to win the tournament. Obviously, the win was the result of a team effort in which everyone contributed enthusiastically. Members of the winning team included Pam Russell, Wendy Vandiver, Briana Brugner, Kelly Smelser, Julie Dingles, Nicole Schmucker, and Dudley Hawkins. In addition, Nicole Schmucker was recognized for her outstanding efforts by being named the tournament's Most Valuable Player. "Although the tournament didn't start out very smoothly [due to a Virginia Tech bus accident], it got better as the day went on," said Pam Russell. Russell also stated that she didn't like playing against her teammates in the semi-finals because she didn't want either team to lose. "You've just got to go out and try not to look at them as your teammates and hope that they don't take it too personally," she conceded. Finally, Russell summed up the attitudes of her teammates by expressing her delight in the fact that they met and defeated UTC in the finals. "They beat us in the finals of their tournament, so we were really looking forward to playing them again," she said. The Lady Scots finished the season 2-1 vs. UTC.

According to coach Pepe Fernandez (now coaching both the mens' and womens' teams), "all of the teams played really well and the tournament was a great success." Coach Fernandez also wished to thank all of the parents and students who came to watch for their support.

The Maryville College soccer teams will now start readying themselves for spring training, which is scheduled to begin on March 11.

Bittersweet finale for the Scots

by Ramier Rodriguez
Echo contributor

The Maryville College mens' basketball team has just completed their regular season schedule. Earning 22 victories, the 1990-91 Fighting Scots have set a new school record for wins in a single season, shattering the previous mark of 19 wins set by the 1987-88 hoopers. The Scots end their regular season ranked 20th in the nation, according to the Associated Press. The Scot cagers also rank nationally in various other categories. They are currently ranked fourth in three-point field goals per game, averaging 8.6. Putting that into perspective, North Carolina State leads division I-A with 9.3. Point man Tim Lawrence is currently fifth in the nation with 8.3 assists per game.

The Scots are lead by senior Jesse Robinette and sophomore Kelvin Richardson, averaging 14 and 18 points per game, respectively. The post positions have been handled solidly by sophomores Babatu "Juice" Willingham and Glen Cullop. Sophomore Kenyon Lacy has provided consistent offense off the bench along with sophomores Greg Keck, Rodney Lane, and Scott Fitzgerald.

Team chemistry has been a key to this year's outstanding campaign. Unselfish scoring by the perimeter players, solid ball handling by the guards, and overall team defense has greatly contributed to the success of the team. "I'm having a great time" said coach Lambert, enjoying the best season of his coaching career. "During some previous years I've wanted the season to be over with, but I'm enjoying every minute of it. I want to win some more games."

Unfortunately, the Scots' post-season came to a bittersweet end Thursday night. After accepting an NCAA National Tournament bid for the first time in Maryville College history, the Scots hosted Washington University of St. Louis, champions of the UCC conference. Although the Scots led for most of the game, Washington rallied in the last few minutes to win the game by a score of 76-73.

Sophomore Glen Cullop goes up for a block; the Fighting Scots most successful season ever ended Thursday night with a hard fought 76-73 loss to Washington University.

MC Diamondmen look forward to promising season

by Eric Etchison
Ass't Baseball Coach

The 1991 Scots Diamondmen begin their season March 2 with great hopes of expanding the winning tradition created by both our mens' and womens' basketball programs. Quality depth will be a key phrase for the Scots, coming off a 13-7 campaign of a year ago. "We have two to three quality defensive players at each position," stated Head Coach Brian Wajert. The first year captain will bolster a fantastic pitching staff including All-South candidate Clint Boling (3-1, 2.56 ERA). Supporting the Scots on the hill will be Mike Ballard, Bobby Pringle, and Glenn Cullop. Stoppers out of the pen include right-handers Scott Solomon and Scott Watson.

Anchoring the Diamondmens' potent offensive attack will be catcher Scottie Cline. This All-South and All-American candidate was ranked 8th nationally for his offensive prowess (.463). Other standouts at the plate include Boling (.371), Solomon (.340), and Mike Reid (.340).

The future looks bright with the addition of freshmen Mark Curtis, Tim Glisson, David Jones, Justin Phillips, Brett Sams, Thomas Smith, Nick Wilson, Ben Wright, and Stacy Waldrop. All will contribute to the Scots winning tradition in 1991. Immediate contributions will be made by junior college transfers Thad Rhodes and Mike Snyder. Both have the offensive and defensive weapons to tear up the opposition. So follow the Scots on the road to an NCAA South Region bid and enjoy exciting Maryville College Baseball in 1991.

The Maryville College Career Day was held Tuesday, March 12 in the Proffitt Dining Room. MC Alumni and representatives from 42 companies were on hand to answer questions and meet students.

The majority of companies were represented by MC alumni. They went as far back as the class of 1949 and went all the way up to the class of 1990.

This annual event serves as a showcase of successful Maryville College graduates. Dr. Charles Brooks, MD, a 1980 graduate in Chemistry said "Maryville really prepared me for medical school...feeling comfortable talking to my professors on a one-to-one basis gave me a big advantage over the other students who had gone to big schools and were intimidated by their professors."

Kim Laisey a Pre-Health Sciences major from the class of '86, was hired at IT Corp. in an entry level position, but quickly moved up to management. She claimed her liberal arts education was highly desirable to her employers. She also stated that "Maryville College has a strong reputation in the area" and throughout the southeastern U.S. "companies as far away as Florida knew about Maryville (College)" she said.

This annual event also allowed students to meet and question prospective employers and provided the companies with the chance to meet potential employees on an informal level. Jean Jones, Director of Career Planning and Placement, said "This is a good way for students to meet prospective employers; only 85% of the available jobs are not advertised."

Some of the companies represented were: Akins and Tombras-public relations, Allways Travel, ALCOA, American Rug Co., Blount Hospital, Boy Scouts, Castner-Knott, Chilhowee Music Academy, Citizens Bank, City of Maryville, Cobble Personnel, Days Inn, Delta Airlines, DOE, Dollywood, FBI, First Security of Tennessee, First Tennessee, Fort Sanders Medical Center, IT Corp., Martin Marietta, ORAU, ORNL, Radio Shack, Safeco, Southern Empowerment Project, St. Mary's, TVA, The Prudential, UT Graduate School, UT Financial Aid, UT Employment Services, UT Hospital, and Wesley Woods.

World Series' speaker discusses Kuwait's history

by Ayesha Dastgir
Echo Contributor

Mr. Brooks Wrampelmeier, former U.S. Ambassador to Kuwait, spoke on "The Gulf War and New Political Alignment" for the Annual Jackson Fund Lecture Series, which focuses on international education on March 7 in the FAC Music Hall.

Wrampelmeier started with a history on the formation of the country Kuwait. Tribes from Central Arabia came and settled in the Kuwaiti Bay around the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Around 1755 the principal families chose the Al Sabah family to stay back to look after everyone's family and be the chief spokesman with the Ottoman Turkish tribes. The Al Sabah family took very prominent positions and developed strong political ties by arranging marriages between first cousins. This custom is still prevalent today.

By the middle of the eighteenth century Kuwait had become an independent, self governing city state with strong trading ties with Iraq. In 1893, Britain recognized Ottoman supremacy over Kuwait. Mobarrak Sabah Al Sabah, the leader of the Sabah family sought British help in order to counteract possible Turkish reprisals.

Until 1961, Kuwait was under Britain's rule. Oil was discovered in 1938 but wasn't exported until after the World War II. The new empire benefitted from their discovery, becoming a welfare state with facilities

MC is a place to speak out

"Superman, where are you???"

Last month the Echo underwent some internal changes. The staff is now composed entirely of hardcore Communists, determined to fight to the end for the overthrow of Democratic institutions everywhere. They hate the environment. Late at night, in their corner office on 2nd floor Fayerweather, unspeakable tortures are routinely committed on very small, defenseless animals.

O.K., O.K., so none of the above is even remotely true, and it is highly unlikely that things will ever get that bad. The point, however, is that even if this were true, many students at MC would not get involved in fighting it. They would call on some larger-than-life figure to come and solve all of their problems. This approach worked well enough for Vicky Vale (recall Batman), but in real life things don't generally work that way.

Many students at MC are unhappy about some phase of life here, be it leaky dorm roofs, undercooked baked potatoes in the lunchroom, seemingly exorbitant tuition hikes...but are these students doing much about it? Complaining to one's friends about some unpleasant condition here may make one feel a little better. It is self-defeating, however, in that it will do little to solve the problem.

The Echo (once again, the staff is not Communist!) encourages students to express what's on their mind about how MC can be made into a better place. Students might do well to talk to their professor when they think they received a lower grade than they deserved, stop in to the Student Programming Office and tell them what kind of events would really be fun, call the editor of the Echo and tell him just how stupid his editorials are...

The Echo does not advocate whining and whimpering. It encourages students to take time and put work into making their opinions, needs, and desires be heard by those who can make a difference. This is the essence of America's great democratic heritage.

Americans should be proud

Dear Editor,

I am writing in response to your editorial of March 1, 1991, entitled "The War Is Over?" In what I am about to say I mean no hard feelings to you personally; I merely wish to have another point of view heard by the readers of the Echo. I know that the Echo has been criticized in the past for being negative and I realize that some of the criticism is undeserved.

However, in your editorial you make the point that "Americans, especially the future leaders here at Maryville College" should not be so concerned with the impressive military power of the U.S., but, they should keep in mind the other problems we as a nation face. At the end of your editorial you further this point by saying that "the age of 'Might makes Right' is coming to an end. It's time to fight a new war with the weapons that make America truly great: adaptability and hard work." You also imply, I hope not purposefully, in paragraph four that patriotism may be bad for our country.

Although I agree that we should not lose sight of other problems in our society, that is no reason to squelch pride in America. Pride in America will not be dangerous, but indeed it will only help Americans fight our battles as a unified nation. This is something that has not existed in a very, very long (indeed too long) time. I know the U.S. will never be totally unified, but as our troops are coming home, let's be unified enough to welcome them and try to solve those other problems with a POSITIVE attitude.

Also, while we must fight a war with "adaptability and hard work" here at home, that is no reason to lay down our military weapons. You called the Gulf War "someone-else's war." We must realize that someone else was an ally of ours who could not defend itself. Many people protested the U.S. military action and asked that we stop so that "peace" could come to the region. There has not been peace in Kuwait since Aug. 2 when the Iraqi army invaded its borders. Now that Iraq is out, there is finally true peace. The only way that peace could have been achieved was to force the aggressors out of the country they raped and pillaged.

You also said that "it's time for Americans to stop pretending to be John Wayne," and you made the point that our military technology is less important than "Sony CD players" because it is less profitable. There is no way to put a price on freedom and true peace—two things most of us in America do not take for granted anymore. If bringing freedom to a defenseless friend is pretending to be John Wayne, then I hope America will always pretend to be John Wayne.

I don't mean to say by this letter that I enjoy war or like seeing soldiers of any country, especially Iraqis that have no idea for what they are fighting, die. War is truly Hell on earth, but sometimes it is the price we must pay to bring peace to as people controlled by a ruthless, irrational man. It was the price we had to pay to liberate Europe from Hitler in the 30's and 40's, to liberate Kuwait from Hussein in 1991, and I hope Americans will make the decision to pay that price for freedom for many, many years to come.

Sincerely,

New grading policy is statistically defended

Recently I was asked by Student Senate to perform a series of statistical tests to determine the effects of the grade change policy on overall GPA's. I conducted a paired difference test using 30 randomly selected transcripts of full time students. The sample data reveal that while there is a small significant decrease, there is not really a practical change.

I should discuss this distinction. Suppose I make a claim that the average weight of the mature male African elephant is 2,400 pounds. If you were omnipotent, it would be possible for you to measure the weights of all such elephants, and give the actual mean weight for the entire population. Let's say for arguments sake that you are able to do this, and that the mean weight is actually 2,401 pounds. Was my claim incorrect?

Technically, the answer is yes. Practically, the answer is no. The difference is so small that my claim would have to be considered "close enough", however inexact.

In light of that argument, I went into the study with the assumption that overall GPA's had not changed. After running the data through STATPAK, I was able to conclude that while there was a significant difference, the average difference amounted to only 4 one-hundredths of one point. That's .04 to those of you with math anxiety. The margin of error was .03 points. In other words, there is a .99 probability that the average drop in semester GPA was between .01 and .07 points. What we have is one left over elephant pound.

There is a human element that has not yet been discussed that may distort the data a bit. Suppose you are a student enrolled in my Math 221, and your final course average is 79.5. I want to examine this number at two different points in time.

It's Spring semester 1989, and you have just completed my course with a score of 79.5. You stand precariously on the fence that divides B- students from C+ students. I have a decision to make. If I give you a C+, which is what my syllabus says you are to receive, then it gets counted in your GPA as a C. If I give you a B-, then it gets counted as a B. This says to me that you get the same amount of credit in the course as the person who worked their tail off to get an 88. I will not allow this injustice to occur. You get a C+.

Now zip ahead in time to Spring semester 1991. Once again, you have completed my course with a grade of 79.5. I can give you a C+, in which case you receive 2.3 quality points per hour. When I carefully consider my decision, I recall that you came to my office frequently, paid attention in class, etc... In light of these extenuating circumstances, I decide to give you a B-, with its 2.7 quality points per hour. After all, there's still a gap between you and the previously mentioned tailless student who now has acquired 3.3 quality points per hour.

I call such a minus a mercy minus, and subsequent talks with other faculty members have made it clear to me that I am not the only person who occasionally uses them. Chances are good that any A- which you received in the Fall might have been registered as a B+ in a previous term. As it turns out, if even one of the minuses in the statistical study was a mercy minus, the result of the test changes. Not only would there be no practical difference, the statistically significant difference would point in the opposite direction. In other words, overall GPA's may have increased slightly!

Many members of the faculty longed for a tool that would enable them to make finer distinctions between students. The new policy seems to have done the job without really affecting overall GPAs.

Students examine idea of Greeks returning to MC

Jana Dalton
Echo Staff Writer

A group representing the larger student body has approached the Student Development Office regarding the chartering of a sorority and fraternity.

Leslie Nier, Director of Campus Life, said the conversation was initiated recently by spokespersons, mostly women, who are interested in creating the bond and unity of a sorority.

In researching the perspectives, Nier defined the distinction of cliques and the Greek system. She noted the two groups as people "with common interests" who "naturally gravitate." Yet the Greeks, according to Nier, have a higher purpose and credibility with their internal academic support and philanthropy.

She said the sorority and fraternity option could promote the familial bind that is sometimes lacking on campus. With their code of service to others, their demand for academic excellence and their promotion of "quality " programs, Nier said the sororities and fraternities are significantly removed from simple social cliques.

But, Nier stressed, the decision is solely based on the students' desire to have such organized groups without feeling "pressured to join or not join." She advocates the positive aspects of sororities and fraternities, particularly those on a national level which provide very strict guidelines. The intention would be to enhance and not detract from the present campus community.

Nier welcomed the possible Greek contribution to the MC community with excitement. She said such organizations could "generate activities" and induce "more involvement" between upper and lower classmen. She also stated it could restore "the automatic relationship between classes" by focusing on big sister, big brother support for under classmen and by honoring the upper classmen. It's "something we've lost here. Lost ritual, rites of passage...Upperclassmen get no respect, they get lost." Nier said.

Other benefits, according to Nier, involve the recruiting possibilities of Greek association and the lessening of the burden on student programming. She recognizes the Greek system as a way of encouraging of groups of commonality to interact instead of being separated by their different interests as they are now.

However, Student Senate President, Chris Varner, did not share Nier's enthusiasm.

His first thought concerned the present alcohol policy. "Fraternities don't have to involve drinking but every other sorority or fraternity involves heavy drinking. Idealistically, does it have to? Pragmatically, show me an instant where it hasn't."

Varner also questioned the need for the Greeks among such a small student body saying that selective groups already exist—groups drawn together by activities or interests, such as football, drama, Middle East. He said the key to these groups lie in their openness to individuals who are involved in the same issues.

There is no official induction so persons can float from group to group depending on time and interest. He also questioned the idea of "being visibly rejected" in such a small community. "At U.T. for example," Varner said, "there is always somewhere else to go—but here? Where else would you go?"

Carolyn Cuddy, Business Administration Professor, said fraternities and sororities serve a purpose at a larger school; because of their size they require means of uniting the students, like a family. However, she declined this structure at MC. "Not at a school this size, it's just one big fraternity / sorority anyway. MC functions that way," Cuddy said.

Both Nier and Varner addressed the strain of adding panhellenic counsel duties to the already taxed student senate and the idea of housing geared to sororities and fraternities. Both also confirmed the required research and investigation needed before any action could be taken.

MC receives new 29 passenger bus from private corporation

Maryville College Press Release

Maryville College students and faculty were on hand Monday afternoon to welcome Maryville College alumni representing American Rug Craftsman, Inc., of Sugar Valley, GA, for a special delivery to the school—a new, 29 passenger bus valued at more than $50,000 to be used by the College's athletic teams, music groups, and other campus groups.

The bus, driven by company president and CEO John C. Thornton, arrived on campus at 4 p.m. bringing a number of Maryville College alumni who will represent American Rug Craftsman, Inc. at the school's campus-wide career day on Tuesday.

In presenting the keys to Maryville College President Richard Ferrin and Athletic Director Randy Lambert, Thornton said, "Maryville College has been a major reason we have become a successful company. During the past six years we have hired nine Maryville graduates who have moved into leadership positions at American Rug Craftsman. Their strong, liberal arts backgrounds have enabled them to perform exceptionally well in our business environment."

In recent years Thornton has supported the College's athletic program because, he says, "I have found that MC coaches produce graduates who work hard, perform well under pressure, and have absolute integrity."

Thornton added, "This bus is a token of gratitude to Maryville College for the help the College has given to us in the form of outstanding graduates."

In accepting the bus Dr. Ferrin noted that "we are thrilled that our students leave here and perform so well that a company would want to show its gratitude in such a magnificent way. Now, we have to keep working in the classrooms, on the playing fields and courts, and in everything we do to produce men and women who will excel, as these alumni have, in whatever fields they choose."

Thornton founded American Rug Craftsman, Inc. six years ago and it is now one of the country's fastest-growing firms, according to Inc. magazine. The only American-owned company dedicated solely to designing and making area rugs. American Rug Craftsman continues to grow and diversify despite the housing slowdown. With 300 employees, annual sales of the privately-held company are estimated at $25 to $30 million.

American Rug Craftsman, Inc. is one of 42 companies participating in Maryville College's Career Day on Tuesday, which will bring alumni from a wide variety of career fields to the campus to meet with students and discuss career opportunities.

1991 Phonathon raises nearly $100,000 for Annual Fund

by Missy Flaherty
Staff Editor

On the evenings Feb. 25-28 and March 4-7 the MC 1991 Phonathon raised $98,000 for the college's Annual Fund. Twenty-two student volunteers raised $33,645, or 34% of the total dollars raised.

Students and faculty met at Wilford House to dial for dollars. The goal of the annual phonathon is to increase alumni participation through a friendly phone call.

The Phonathon was not only beneficial for MC. Student volunteers received free gifts, food, and cash prizes as incentives. Elizabeth Steverson, jr., raising $6,870 in pledges, was the top winner. Representing Habitat for Humanity, she received a $180 cash prize. Anne Pearman representing the junior class won $115 in cash. The senior and sophomore classes as well as the football team were also represented.

Organizers stated that they felt that the phonathon was a success. They encouraged students who did not get the chance to participate this year to join in next year. Jeanne Fulkerson from the Office of Communication said "I hope that MC students will realize that this is not only a fun project for a good cause—it is profitable."

The Phonathon will continue through the coming weeks during the day. Interested volunteers should contact Jeanne Fulkerson at the Office of Communications.

Student elections, Pearson's GPA requirements discussed at Senate meeting

by Kathleen McArthur
Echo Staff Writer

The Student Senate held meetings on February 14 and 28 in the CCM to discuss the new grading policy, the new elections handbook, Student Programming Board selection process, and the requirements for living in Pearson's.

Dr. Bunde and Dr. Naylor met with Senate to discuss the new grading policy implemented at the first of the 1990-91 school year. Naylor stated that changes were made to promote more equality and fairness in borderline cases. For example, the changing of a C to B is unfair where as C+ to B- would be a closer distribution. No A+ is offered because our scale is competing with grading scales of other schools which is based on a 4.0.

Dr. Bunde suggested taking these issues to the chair of the department. Varner noted that the system is optional for faculty members.

Faculty Representative Dave Vinson explained his study of the effects of the new scale. Senate plans to continue these discussions at the next meeting.

Bruce Guillame was present to discuss the draft of the new communicable illness policy written to give guidelines on handling these illnesses. After reviewing the material, Senate approved the policy as of the draft of January 7, 1991.

The next item on the agenda was a discussion about the Elections Handbook proposal reviewed at the last meeting. Some senators expressed doubts about holding elections in Pearson's because of lack of traffic.

Varner reported that the athletic listening sessions were cancelled and rescheduled because of basketball conflicts. He explained the Athletic Committee handout that was enclosed with the agenda was about conference options for the future.

The ALC calendar for next year received disapproval from senators.

The Food Service Committee has scheduled a meeting for Tues. February 26 to discuss costs, pros and cons, of the Marriott contract.

Varner asked for feedback on Administration Day. Senate wants this event scheduled 2-3 times a semester. There were divided feelings about the effectiveness of the event.

There was also a discussion about the new Student Programming Board proposal. There was a motion to table the discussion and allow for changes to be made. The motion passed.

Senate met again on February 28. Election Committee presented a draft of the Election Handbook. Senators were asked to suggest any changes or additions. Varner expressed concern about the elections for president of Senate held the first week of April in Pearson's lobby.

Varner restated senators concerns about the effectiveness of holding elections in Pearson's because commuters would not be included. He also noted that some senators suggested spring elections of class senators for the following year be held in the dorms during floor meetings, others wanted another meeting to be held a week prior to elections, and a few senators thought putting ballots under dorm room doors to be turned in to the resident director.

Senators also expressed the desire to have elections remain as in previous years with the possible addition of a box in Issac's. They gave their opinions in an open discussion about the different suggestions and the effectiveness of the locations for the most voter participation.

Faculty Representative Dave Vinson suggested sending a memo to faculty asking them to announce elections and candidates a few days prior to voting day. Leslie Nier brought up the idea of putting out an election issue of the Echo highlighting the event and the people running for the positions.

Chairperson and Sophomore Greg Basham asked Senators to express their preferences between holding both presidential and representative Senate elections at the same time, or allowing for a two week space between each to give presidential losers a chance to run in the dorm and class representative elections.

There was a motion to vote on holding elections in the dorms and Issac's in the first and third weeks of April with a two week span between each election. The presidential elections would come first, and the representative elections will follow. The motion

MC Theatre gearing up for spring musical

Michelle Hall
Echo Staff Writer

The Maryville College spring musical "Stop the World - I Want to Get Off," written by Leslie Bricusse and Anthony Newley, will be presented at 8:15 p.m. on April 25, 26, and 27 in the Music Hall.

The cast includes Michael Hatcher as Littlechap and Charlotte Borderieux as Evie. The daughters of Littlechap and Evie are Jane, played by Cindy Huffstetler, and Susan, played by Krista Loy. The Announcers will be David Garzone and David Kirby. The Chorus of Seven Girls has not yet been cast. Rhonda Cutshaw-Mayfield will provide piano accompaniment.

Dr. Daniel Taddie, MC music professor, will serve as both play director and music director for the production. Usually, said Taddie, the play and the music are directed by two different people, but because MC is currently searching for a full-time theater professor, he will direct both.

The show contains both comic and serious elements. Set in the 1960's, it explores the universal themes of birth, growth, marriage and family, career, and death. The timelessness of this life-cycle is portrayed through a circus-like setting, elemental colors, white-face clown makeup, and pantomime.

"It seems like it's going to be lots of fun," said Borderieux, adding "there's a lot of humor that you can miss if you don't pay attention."

Security Guard Reunited With Famous Brother

John Worth

Last week in an unprecedented meeting, George Bush spent a few hours listening to the antics of our own Eldria Hurst.

"It was just...a crazy sort of thing," Hurst said to members of the press. In the same press conference he revealed that president Bush is in fact his long lost brother, seperated at birth by a unique twist of fate. The meeting centered around, "catching up on old times," Hurst said. Neither Hurst nor the President revealed anything about their seperation. Bush said, "It wouldn't be prudent to bring up the issues of our painful seperation. Let sleeping dogs lie. We just want to spend time together, a commodity denied us for these many years." When reporters asked Hurst what he thought about Bush, he replied, "Heck, I didn't even vote for him!"

The announcement was made after the Presidential address to Congress. Bush introduced Hurst as "the silent voice of my past, and definitely the voice of America's youth." The title given to Hurst can be traced back to days when he would "hang out" with Anthrax and the Bee Gees, as well as the late Andy Gibb. "I loved that man," Hurst is quoted as saying.

Hurst opened his personal address to congress with a stunning poetic reading of "Jive Talking," which had the congressmen in virtual tears. He then told his many versions of the Nantucket limerick, keeping the distinguished masses guffawing in the aisles.

Hurst says he is planning a fishing with the "Bush Meister," saying, "I hope he brings the beer."

God bless you, Eldria; we do too.

MC Diamondmen display talent and promise at home

by Eric Etchison
Ass't Baseball Coach

The Maryville College baseball team started the 1991 season in excellent form by sweeping NAIA rival Cumberland College 4-2 and 2-1 in a double header at home on March 2. The Scots were led by stellar defense and quality starts from pitchers Clint Boling and Mike Ballard. Offensively, the Indians were pounded by Scottie Cline, as he went 4 for 6 during the series.

On Thursday, March 7, the Diamondmen split a double header with Emory and Henry 7-5 and 2-3. Once again, pitching and defense were the key weapons, as Neal Pelletier's 33 put-outs (in four games) indicated.

Strong relief appearances by Scott Solomon and Glen Cullop (1-0) highlighted the afternoon, while Solomon's first career home run led the Scots' comeback in the first game. Unfortunately, the Scots' bats were silenced in the nightcap.

On the season, the Scots stand at 5-5 after splitting games with Tusculum and Emory and losing to Cumberland on the road. Although the team is hitting only .215, watch for the Scots, led by Scottie Cline (.454) and Mark Eakin (.333), to light up the scoreboard on Saturday, March 16, against Centre. This will be the Diamondmens' next home game. In addition, the coaches wish to extend a special thanks to all of the fans who have supported the team.

Lady Scots wrap-up successful season

by Don Evon
Echo Sports Editor

The Lady Scots pleased a full house in the Maryville College gym on Saturday, March 2, as they hosted the Lady Colonels of Centre College in the first round of the NCAA Women's Division III National Basketball Tournament. Having been to the Final Four the last two years in a row, Centre was considered to be one of the major obstacles standing between Maryville College and a national championship, before the tournament began. Undaunted, however, the Lady Scots eliminated Centre 88-80 in front of an enthusiastic crowd to advance to the "sweet sixteen."

After the Centre cheerleaders misspelled their school's name, Dr. Ferrin got the Maryville fans going as he removed his jacket to lead the crowd in a cheer.

Leah Onks and Cindy Huffaker led the scoring for the Scots with 21 and 18 points, respectively. In addition, Huffaker pulled down 10 rebounds. Other standouts included Kathy Scott, Sherri Daigle, Honey Brown, and Sheryl Ramsey.

Despite a full court press, vicious fouling, and, at times, poor officiating, the Lady Scots kept their composure in the second half. In fact, Maryville led by as many as 17 points with 5:24 remaining in the game, and although Centre pulled back to within seven, consistent free throw shooting by Onks and Brown secured the win. According to Coach Moore, tenacious rebounding was the key to the

Teamwork is encouraging sign for MC softball

The Maryville College softball team opened their season on Tuesday, March 5, with a double header at Carson Newman. Although they lost their first two games, the Scots were relatively pleased with their teamwork. According to pitcher Angie Lawler, the Lady Scots seem to be working well together. "Teamwork and a positive attitude will be key factors to a good season," she added. Also on the mound for the Scots was sophomore Tina Brantley. Offensively, the Scots were led by Nikki Boop with a double, while Dena Godsey and Peggy Bratt both added singles.

The Lady Scots dropped their second double header to Tusculum, at home, on Thursday, March 7. The team did show encouraging improvement at the plate, however, as they increased their base hits from four to

Some felt that it should remain a dorm for those with appropriate grades as a privileged living environment. Others felt that grades should not decide where students were able to live. Senators also expressed their discontent with the on-campus living requirement. Vamer suggested having Leslie Nier address on and off-campus living topic at the next meeting.

The next item on the agenda was the announcement that discussions would soon begin about the budget for next year.

The next meeting will be held on at April 4th @ 1:30 p.m. in the CCM.

In the field senior Joni Harper exemplified some of the Scots promising defensive ability as she threw out a base runner at first on a pop fly from left field to complete the double play. Freshman catcher Nikki Boop played well for the Scots behind the plate.

Having two of their toughest opponents out of the way for awhile, the Scots turned things around against Tennessee Wesleyan. According to Lori Chambers, the Scots received a much needed confidence boost by defeating Wesleyan in both games of the double header in Athens on Tuesday.

In his opinion, the reasons for the United States entering the Gulf War were to get the legitimate government of the Sabah family restored, to protect oil, and to maintain peace and stability in the region. Now that the war is over, the legitimate government has been restored, and the threat to the Middle East has been eliminated.

He said the next step would be for the GCC to take its responsibility and obligations more seriously. Both Kuwait and Saudi Arabia have to take different approaches towards the Palestinians even though Kuwait is going to be tied up rebuilding itself for the next five years. The United States role in the Middle East would be to try and stop the Israeli and the Palestinian issue.

As of this year, biology students at Maryville College enjoy a new, more flexible curriculum which offers several new courses and options but requires fewer hours. The changes were implemented in an effort to meet the individual needs of students and update the biology program to reflect new field concentrations.

According to Dr. Paul Threadgill, assistant professor of biology, the changes reflect the department's desire to give biology majors a broader area of training. "We at least wanted to give them the flexibility to go in a number of directions," he said, adding, "We understand that the requirements for graduate school and medical school are rigorous but we still want them to have a broader background."

With these changes the biology department hopes to address the students' needs with a single major, broad in the liberal arts tradition but versatile enough to meet individual interests. This might be met at a large university by streamlining students into many different specialized majors. Dr. Michael Torres, associate professor of biology, described the goals of the new program. "What we are trying to do is establish a curriculum which provides a common background for all biology graduates but, at the same time, enough flexibility so each student has his or her own individual background," said Torres.

The new program, he said, attempts to answer two basic questions: what constitutes basic knowledge for every biology graduate, and what options can be given so that each student's interests are emphasized.

With these questions in mind, the new curriculum was organized. Freshmen biology majors are now required to take two semesters of introductory biology as opposed to the one semester formerly required. Sophomores must take genetics in the fall and ecology in the spring. Because environmental issues have become so important, Threadgill said, ecology

MC profile: Coach Randy Lambert

by Mary Rose Slaughter
Echo News Editor

To bring the basketball from winning only 33% percent of their games to winning 70% of their games takes a good coach. Randy Lambert is that man. Lambert said he came to MC in 1980 because it was a good opportunity considering his age and experience. At the time he was 26 years old and had coached high school basketball at Lenior City High School for three after receiving his Master's degree. He was going to use MC as a stepping stone to better things but decided to stay because he was comfortable with the ideals of the school and was growing with the community. He was also able to spend more time with his family than he would have if he had been at another school. Lambert started out teaching basketball and tennis. He was the youngest coach in the NCAA when he started out. In 1985 he was made Athletic Director.

His future plans include upgrading the athletic facilities and finding ways to not lose the students he has to other schools. At this time, the Athletic Committee is gathering facts about the different conferences available to our school. There are few NCAA Division III schools in the southeast, making it hard to form a conference that has similar athletic and academic qualities. When the committee has all of the facts, they will make a recommendation to Dr. Ferrin. When asked if a conference made a difference, Lambert said that it made scheduling games and recruiting easier.

What kind of man does Randy Lambert think he is? He said he is a "fin Christian gentleman; outspoken, open-minded, reserved and

From the Editor...

WALLS, WALLS, AND MORE WALLS...

"I'm looking over the wall, and they're looking at me!!!"

Thus snarled the Sex Pistol's Johnny Rotten in 1976 in perhaps one of the most profound statements ever made about the Berlin Wall affair. What else can one do about such a grossly absurd situation but make fun of it? The two most powerful, if not advanced, nations of the world "don't like the way the other thinks" (i.e. have ideological differences), so one of the countries constructs a silly, not to mention unaesthetic, cement wall.

It might be said that that this was a childish way to deal with such a problem as the U.S. and the Soviet Union were having at the time. Even children, however, don't generally act that stupidly. And when they do, the stupidity of their action usually wears off the next day and the problem is no longer a problem. It takes a sophistication of which only an adult mind is capable to pull off such a stunt as the Cold War for almost fifty years.

Of course a situation like the Cold War is not unique to the imaginations of the geniuses who inhabit the White House and Kremlin. Common folk the world over seem to have no problem for separating people because they look different, they talk different, they eat different foods, etc... Sometimes it seems that people hardly need a reason to put up walls between each other.

Of course the students here at MC are much too intelligent and spiritually advanced to fall into such a mode of contrived and prejudicial thinking, right? Right, right? Somebody? Anybody? Are you with me? This campus is a warm and accepting place for all students, isn't it?

The Echo challenges all MC students to live up to the great potential of which they are capable. It takes courage and strength to break through the barriers between people imposed by society. Take a look over these walls and see just who is that person looking back.

Former Greek says, "Not at MC!"

Dear Editor,

I opened my mailbox today to find my copy of the Echo, but I was not pleased to see the article by Jana Dalton on Greeks returning to the M.C. campus ("Students examine the idea of Greeks returning to MC" March 16, 1991). First! I want to say that this letter is not directed against Ms. Dalton because I have no qualms against anyone on this campus, but I do have qualms against the Greek system.

Being one who has been involved in the Greek system and in MC activities, I feel that I have the experience to say that a fraternity and sorority on this campus is NOT the answer to our problems. True, the Greek system may create "common interests," but they, in many instances, do not promote "quality" programs. While at UT my sorority concentrated their activities mainly on planning parties with the fraternities on campus (which were called "Mixers" because of the alcohol mixing) and on planning their own parties. Little was ever said about philanthropy. Also, the grades were never discussed unless a specific person's G.P.A. fell below the national requirement, and then it was only discussed between the chapter council and the individual member.

Mr. Varner mentioned the drinking policy. I have never been to a Greek function where there was no alcohol and Dr. Ferrin mentioned to me at Christmas time that the alcohol policy would not be changed. Rejection and discrimination is also something that will definitely happen. Sorority and fraternity Rush is nothing but upperclassmen judging the incoming freshmen on how they dress, how they look, and how much their parents make!

The last thing I have against the Greek system is the cost of being a member. So many people complain about how much tuition is here at MC, so what are they going to do if they have to pay dues? My dues ran between $150 to $290 per semester, while sororities and fraternities with houses have dues of approximately $350 to $590 per semester.

By being raised in Maryville and having a parent as an alumni, I have grown to love Maryville College for the institute it has become. I know there are

survey conducted by Amirou Willingham and Jeff Huffman

What do you think about the overall integration of students at MC?

In the classroom there seems to be no problem with integration. The American students find it hard to communicate with the foreign students. Students from different cultures have things to offer that can contribute to the lives of the other students. People seem to be more comfortable with people of their own ethnic group. There is an effort being felt to improve ethnic relations. It needs to be kept up and improved upon.

Lilliam Collmann, Faculty

I think it is very separated. They don't even try to integrate. The Americans hesitate in trying new things, they are scared. They act like they don't need new friends.

anonymous

It is working alright. I haven't found too many prejudice people.
anonymous

It is working to a certain extent, but there are still barriers; it is not as liberal as it should be. This is our society. We should try to change our society by being liberal in our society; we should look past barriers and tell ourselves, "people are people."
anonymous

You get different feelings and attitudes everyday from the white students.

anonymous

Few problems naturally, but overall I think we get along. I think it's good that we can get together on a small community basis.
anonymous

It's good. Racism exists everywhere. They interact well here. I don't see any big problems.
anonymous

Japanese make friends with Japanese. Blacks make friends with blacks. I think it is very separated. I think some Japanese are making American friends just to learn English, but it can be more than that.

anonymous

There are a lot of groups. This college is very separated. Not only between ethnic groups, but between groups of interest. If I want to talk with one group there is no problem. They just like to be together.
Tshiko Mukaba, Fr.

It is very separate, you can see it in the cafeteria especially, I try to integrate as much as possible.
anonymous

I think it is good. It is a good opportunity to learn about different opinions, different lifestyles. With one race it would not be interesting.

problems in some of the things on campus, but let's bring back old traditions to make things better. My father told me there has NEVER been any Greek societies on campus, but there were social clubs where students could choose the club they wanted to be in instead of being chosen or rejected by the club. To get students to interact more with each other let's have more pep-rallies for football and basketball, let's have more activities during Homecoming week, and let's have an outrageously big and fun May madness! For the seniors we could always bring back the Daisy Chain that the graduating class would walk between to graduation. The chain was usually made by the girls in the three remaining classes. Why can't we look to our alumni to see how they kept things happy and good while they were here instead of bringing in something new that most people know very little about?

I transferred here to get away from the stress and the horror of a sorority because I knew they were not here. PLEASE do not consider bringing something like that to place as wonderful as Maryville College!

Sincerely,
Carrie Callaway, jr.

Challenge yourself

During my time at MC I have been frequently disappointed with the behavior of various members of the MC community, including faculty, staff, students and, most often, myself. There have been occasions when I should have said something and didn't, times when I shouldn't have said anything and did, and a large variety of other things that I wish I had done differently. I see the same things happening when I turn my eyes away from myself and look outward. Everyone, at times, makes mistakes that affect other people in a negative way.

Throughout life I have learned that when more is expected of you, you produce more because, ultimately, you challenge yourself to rise to greater heights. This applies to behavior as well. If you challenge yourself to act better within the community while, at the same time, other community members do the same, everyone stands to benefit.

What do we, the members of the MC community, believe in? What standards do we hold ourselves to? What is important to us? Why do we act the way we do? What is the MC community, other than a group of people geographically situated close to one another? Why are we here? What do we expect of ourselves and each other?

I firmly believe that the time has come for us, each individually and as a community, to agree on these questions and document the results. It is time for us to challenge ourselves contractually to live up to certain standards of conduct, and when I say us I mean the entire MC community—faculty, staff, students—everyone. It is time for us to publicly demand the best from ourselves for ourselves. I am not referring to the MC Statement of Purpose, which defines why MC exists. I am talking about challenging about challenging ourselves on a far more personal level, each and every community member. I believe that the time has come for a covenant that each MC community member can sign their name to as a challenge to ourselves and an affirmation of what we believe in.

If anyone has any thoughts on this idea, positive or negative, please drop me a line. My box number is 2606, and my phone number is 8347.

Chris Varner, jr.
Senate President

No, it is not working because if you have white friends they will always view you as a black instead of a normal human being. There is not good integration because every where you go on this campus there are separate groups. Most of the activities are for the white students. Just because the whites are in the majority does not mean everything should go their way. It should be universal, something for everybody.
anonymous

In some situations you have relations that work and others that don't; some of the white students are sincere.
anonymous

You meet a few prejudice people but for the most part the students are sincere.

New climbing wall challenges students

by Jeff Huffman
Echo Staff Writer

Installed in January and scaling to a vertical 16 feet, the new climbing wall is the newest challenge in the Mountain Challenge roster.

Spanning 45 feet across, it has 150 small, rock-like sculptured pieces fit for handholds or toeholds. These handholds dot the wall, nut and bolted in one of the variety of configurations possible for a climb. It was built with plywood reinforced with polyurethane boat resin and sand. The boards are set in two by four foot frames, with 36 holds per board.

Chris Milsaps, coordinator of Mountain Challenge activities, said "the climbing wall is fun for everybody.

We still need to keep in mind that that there needs to be Mountain Challenge staff present when people are climbing."

Anyone, regardless of age, size or weight, can climb on the wall at almost anytime as prescribed by the Mountain Challenge Staff person, who provides the climbing equipment, safety and experience. There will be a climbing contest on April 20.

A five year old has already climbed the wall, as well as a person in their late fifties. Milsaps added, "Approximately 25 regular climbers come once a week. On top of that, we have inquiries left and right ..."

For anyone interested in climbing the wall, contact Crawford House at extension 8125, or come by between eight and five P.M. during the week.

William (Bill) P. Knight, a former Maryville College student who was seriously injured in a car accident on March 11, 1990 on Alcoa Highway, is now residing in Oxford, Georgia. Knight had a medical check-up this month. He is 15% handicapped with limited movement in his right hand

Knight was a freshman at Maryville College in the 1989 - 90 school year. He was injured in a multiple vehicle, head-on collision, resulting in the death of a Knoxville woman.

Knight is currently enrolled at Emory and Oxford, a two year college. He is working at the Belk's in Covington, Georgia. His parents say he is much improved since the accident.

Media's role in developing of foreign policy debated at Great Decisions

by John Worth
Ass't Editor

On April 3, 1991, the Great Decisions program at MC continued with a speech in the Proffit Dining Room concerning media's role in shaping foreign policy. Christopher Capato, junior, gave the presentation to a crowd of about eight, including Dr. Brunger, Dr. Cowan, Joan Worley, and Ken Garland of the Knoxville News Sentinel.

The speech contained plenty of information concerning new technologies involved in media coverage, including mention of how news coverage has improved as a result of this. After the speech, a discussion ensued between several members. At this point the issue was dealt with, though censorship of the media was the hot topic.

Garland expressed a need for media self censorship. Mrs. Worley agreed, saying the public is not always given the facts, either by the government or the media.

She posed the question, how differently would the founding fathers have written the first amendment if they knew the drastic role media would play in foreign policy?

Dr. Brunger added substance to the issue, using Live-Aid as an example of how a British newsman captured the attention of the world by showing pictures of starving Ethiopians. The attention led to world-wide relief, though Western political leaders wanted to depose the harsh Ethiopian government.

The Great Decisions program will return in January 1992.

The Tomster...got a good book...Readermeisters, check out the review!

by John Worth
Entertainment editor

Tom Clancy is renowned as one of the finest writers of modern fiction. His novels have entangled many readers within the complex plots and intriguing details. Fans of his novels know the feeling of reading a Clancy novel and being fascinated by the way he brings all the elements of the story together.

"Clear and Present Danger" is one of Clancy's newer works. It deals with covert operations by the CIA in dealing with the drug problem in the United States. The characters are all related in some form or other, usually through some character trait. The plot is simple and direct. Clancy masterfully manipulates it to serve his purposes.

The story goes like this. A Coast Guard Captain, termed a hero by his contemporaries, is given an assignment to capture drug runners in the Gulf of Mexico. He comes across a triple murder while patrolling, and, though he does not know it at the time, he uncovers a cornucopia of material useful to the FBI and CIA. Meanwhile a former Los Angeles street kid is taken from his Marine unit and placed in an elite squad of Marine light fighters. He trains to perfect those skills he has so nearly perfected. His name and rank are taken away, and his squad heads for the jungles of South America to do battle with the Medellin drug cartel.

That is the basis for the story. There are more characters and more

REM disappoints with new album

by Skip Heverly
Echo Editor

"Hello. My name is Cosmo Rehab. Today the new R.E.M. disc came out on the shelves. I rode my bike to the store to get it. I was kind of in a daze as I had just woken up, but there were some big hills along the way that I had to climb, and that helped me to get in touch with the day.

"When I got to the store I found all sorts of R.E.O. Speedwagon discs (Why, oh why were they allowed to make so many recordings?) but not one R.E.M. Not a one. I asked the cashier, who had long, permed hair and too much of the wrong color eye makeup, where, oh where they were. She showed me to the main display rack. Right there alongside Great White and Gloria Estefan. Are these guys still cool with all the mainstream airplay they've been receiving in the past few years?

"I told the aforementioned cashier that I was reviewing the disc for the Maryville College newspaper and she gave it to me at a small discount—kinda neat, huh? I strode into the mall, excited, but still the daze lingered slightly. I think she must have been in her early twenties, the cashier.

"Rode home with blistering speed. It's a beautiful day, my lungs are strong and I care about the world. It's not the end, is it? We're not really "Out of Time," are we?

"When I got home I plunked it in my CD player and gave it a whirl. The first thing I heard were the spoken words, "hey, I can't find nothing on the radio." Alright, Peter, Mike, Michael and Bill, we all know that; is it quite so necessary to be so blatant? You're not

MC student wins local body building competition

by Don Evon
Echo Sports Editor

On March 9, Robert Thomas competed in his very first body building contest...and won. "I was just going to have fun," said Thomas, "and once I saw the guys I'd be competing against, I didn't think I had a chance."

Thomas (19) competed against five other muscle men in the teenage division of the contest which was held at William Blount High School.

Thomas, weighing in at 146 pounds, was smaller than most of the other young men he was competing against, and he seemed to credit his strong showing to his lower body. "Some of the other guys had huge upper bodies," he stated, "but their lower bodies seemed to need some work. I think it might have been my stomach and legs that helped me win."

After noticing a poster that had been taped to a door in the gym informing students of the contest, Thomas began dieting and intense weight training to prepare for the competition. "I altered the football weight lifting program a little bit during the last couple of weeks before the competition by decreasing the amount of weight I was lifting and increasing the reps [repetitions] to tone my muscles," he said.

Because it was his first competition, Thomas didn't know quite what to expect. "I had seen some contests on T.V., but other than that I just read a couple of body building magazines and took some advice from my friends," he admitted.

Thomas will be competing in his second contest on Saturday, April 13, in Chattanooga.

Mens' Soccer team hosts Bradfield of England

by Don Evon
Echo Sports Editor

In an effort to generate local interest in the sport of soccer and to promote Knoxville as one of the sites for the 1994 World Cup, the Maryville College Mens' Soccer Team hosted Bradfield College of England at home on April 1. The international exhibition game between the freshmen and sophomores of both schools was just one of the stops on the English team's tour of Tennessee, and those who came to watch enjoyed an exciting, fast-paced, and hard-fought match.

The two teams played to a 0-0 tie in the first half, and although the second half brought about another 22 scoreless minutes of play, both teams had begun to pick up the pace and create more threatening scoring opportunities. Finally, about mid-way through the second half, Bradfield's unmarked Paul Chester drilled a shot from 22 yards out which found the back, left side of the Maryville net. It was not until late in the game that Maryville's Cam Dodson was able to respond with a nice goal from the right side of the penalty area.

Coach Pepe Fernandez stated that he was very pleased with the way the Scots played. "We've got a great group of guys coming back, and I'm really excited about next season," he told the team.

Bradfield will resume its tour in Nashville and finish up in Chattanooga on Friday.

Lady Scots continue to improve on offense

by Laquita Gernt and Don Evon
Echo Staff Writer and Sports Editor

Head softball coach Kandis Schram would probably be one of the first to tell you that the Lady Scots' record, which now rests at 4-10, does little to reflect how well the team has performed offensively during their last eight games. For example, on Friday, March 15, the Scots dropped a pair of close games to Cumberland College, losing 8-9 and 7-8. The team hit the ball well however, accumulating nine singles and three triples (including two by Joni Harper) in the first game and five singles and a double in the second.

After a week off, the Scots split two games with Austin Peay. Although they lost the first game 0-1, the Lady Scots took charge in the second game

Disappointing Spring Break for MC Diamondmen

by Don Evon
Echo Sports Editor

As you may already know, the Maryville College Baseball Team made history last week as they sacrificed their spring break to take part in a six game road trip, but it wasn't exactly the type of accomplishment that they would like to be remembered for. The Scots lost all six games over the break including a 0-43 loss to Methodist College which broke an 89 year old NCAA record.

After sweeping Centre on March 16 and Bethany on the 23rd, "we were 9-7 at the break, and things were looking really good, but that's when everything started falling apart," stated Coach Eric Etchison. "We lost six in a row to three really good teams," he conceded.

Incidentally, according to Coach Etchison, NC Wesleyan, Methodist sub-plots, but it would take pages to accurately describe them all. The only flaw in the book is the relatively slow beginning; however, once that boundary has been overcome, it is possible to get lost in the pages.

If you need a book to read for relaxation, this is the one. If you want something to read for summer, this is the one. If you don't read a lot but would like to read Tom Clancy's Clear and Present Danger, it is definitely worth your while.

trying to build a larger audience by spelling out what you already said on "Murmer", your immortal first album, are you? Heaven forbid the great champions of 'do your own thing' rock and roll should sell out.

At least I was able to make a big salad, a big vegetarian salad, with Paul Newman's Recipe Dressing. By the time I had finished lunch, the album had ended with Michael Stipe and Kate Pierson from the B-52's singing melodically to the faded finish.

"I was sadly disappointed. No nihilism here. It seems that as far as R.E.M. is concerned, there's still plenty o' time—the money will be there long after the originality is gone."

QUESTION from p.3

It is not good because this is a very racist and redneck school.

anonymous

I think there is a lot of separatism going on inside of the college.

anonymous

I think it is fine. There is a little bit of everything. But I think a lot of the international students do not have American friends.

anonymous

It is not working like it should; you have separatism - you have an all white group and an all black group.

anonymous

As far as intermingling with white students, it is on the average.

anonymous

It has been better lately than it has been in the past. Some of the white students think black people are bad. Some activities are bringing the black, white, and international students together.

anonymous

Things are a lot more separate. I don't see much relations.

anonymous

I don't know that it is really good. There's not that much interaction.

Anna Larson

From my angle, it looks good. There's a lot of Japanese, Spaniards, and blacks. It's grown well. It is good.

James Fitzpatrick

I don't see any major problems with any one group being too exclusive. I think it just happens that most members of different groups don't interact often. But when they do it is acceptable.

anonymous

It's a lot of white people that will not speak, you have some that do occasionally, and you have some that have an open association with black people; none of them really understand us.

anonymous

Unfortunately, I don't think there is much integration.

"The bottom line is, we've had great pitching (with the exception of the infamous Methodist game) and no offense, so that's what we're concentrating on right now," emphasized Coach Etchison.

As of April 3, the Scots still have nine more games to play on the road before their next home game which will take place on Saturday, April 20 at 1 p.m. against the University of the South. The Diamondmen now stand at 9-13 on the season.

to secure a 3-1 win. Again the team hit the ball hard. Peggy Bratt and Shannon Nelson each singled while, Jenny McCafferty singled twice. Tina Brantley added a double, and Joni Harper contributed with a triple in the 7th inning.

Even though their offense continued to improve, the Lady Scots dropped a game to both Hope College and Tennessee Tech on March 23. The team had seven singles and a triple against Hope as second baseman Peggy Bratt went 3 for 3. In the second game, the Scots had seven singles, three doubles, and a triple and, although they rallied in the 6th, they were unable to come away with a win.

Finally, the Scots split two games with Carthage on Wednesday, April 3. The team will look forward to improving upon its deceiving 4-10 record at Mary Washington Tournament this weekend.

course from each of three categories: organismal biology, plant organismal biology, and cellular biology. Juniors are also required to take a new course, senior seminar, to help prepare them for their senior thesis. Threadgill describes the seminar as a method to help students understand research strategies in science, learn how to put a visual presentation together, and practice presenting ideas before a group. Senior year students will be able to take courses that specialize in their interests along with their independent study.

"Biology is a field that is really dynamic, now more than ever," said Torres. "It is much more diversified, and we have to answer that in course offerings."

Changes in the program reflect not only the desire for versatility but also changes in faculty. With the addition of Threadgill in 1988, courses in ecology and botany, his area of specialty, became available. Because Torres has joined the staff this year, new courses in cellular and molecular biology have been added. Also, Lynette Siever has been hired to teach anatomy and physiology, currently taught by Dr. Eileen Riordan, associate professor of biology. Riordan will be moving to part-time next year.

Biology students do not necessarily see the new program in terms of fewer hours. Most are more interested in the increased number of options. Junior biology major Chris Millsaps switched to the new track. "On the old track where there was only one choice, the new offers two or three different choices," he stated. An example, he said, is his choice to take botany over physiology because it related to his emphasis in ecology.

In addition to choosing from new biology courses, many students choose to take optional classes like physics or organic chemistry because they are recommended for those planning to attend graduate school.

Paul Hoffmann, senior biology major, does not see taking a second year of chemistry, required on the old track, as optional for him. "Any job interview you have in a biology field asks how much chemistry have you had," he stated.

Students pledge to protect the earth

by Michelle Hall
Echo Staff Writer

Maryville College will celebrate Earth Day on Monday, April 22, 1991. The theme this year is again "Everyday is Earth Day." Earth Day has been celebrated every April 22 since the first Earth Day in Washington in 1970. Though it is not possible to trace the origin of the entire environmental movement to a single event, the first Earth Day was a catalyst that transformed a specialized interest into a popular one.

This year MC will kick off Earth Day with an outdoor meal. Dinner will be served beside Pearsons Dining Hall on Wednesday, April 17.

On Monday, April 22, the Student Task Force will have a table set up in the foyer of Pearsons where students can sign a contract in which they pledge to recognize Earth Day regularly with a single action. Students can promise to do one or more of the following actions:

1. Use a ceramic mug.
2. Walk, not drive on campus.
3. Take a shorter shower.
4. Rotate your tires and put air in them for better gas mileage.
5. Recycle your aluminum cans.
6. Use a low-phosphate detergent for your clothes.

7. Take your own reusable bag to the grocery store.
8. Choose non-aerosol products.
9. Eat one more meatless meal a week.

10. Share a magazine and newspaper subscription with your friends.

"The idea is that they will pick one on Earth Day and continue to do it throughout the year," said Task Force representative Heather Smith.

Smith also expressed concern that students would overlook Earth Day this year because it will not be celebrated with as much festivity as last year's Earth Day concert.

"This year, because of a smaller budget and the fact that it's on a weekday we can't do as much, but we want them to remember it," said Smith.

Campus, students benefit from Parent's Day

by Mary Rose Slaughter
Echo News Editor

For the second year, the Parent's Association presents Parents' Day. This is one of two events during the school year that is devoted to the parents. The Parent's Association sponsors a Parents' Weekend during the fall. It is to get the parents on campus, to get them more involved with their child's education.

There are several events planned for the visiting parents. They will talk to some of the faculty and some of the students. They will tour the computer labs and the library. The parents will watch a baseball game, hear a student recital and go to an Academic Awards Banquet. "I think it is one of the best things to come down the pike for the college in a long time," says Jane Richardson, head of Parent Program.

The Parents' Council, made up of 5 couples from each class, will also meet. They will discuss fund raising, past and future, and talk with faculty and students about several concerns. According to Richardson, the school benefits from the different points of view the parents bring to the campus. MC also benefits from the results of the fundraisers. Four of the lamp posts that have been put up outside the library have been purchased by the Parents' Association.

Next fall, Richardson says, the Parents' Association hopes to combine Parent's Weekend with Homecoming. For more information call Jane Richardson at the Parent Programs office 981-8205.

From the Editor...

MLK Jr. and Skip speak as one

"I have a dream. I have a dream of a new America. I speak only of America, because where America leads, the rest of the world is likely to follow. It has been that way throughout the twentieth century and, with a new direction, it will continue to be so well into the twenty-first century.

"I speak of a new America because the old one is heading for disaster. Love Canal, Three Mile Island and the Exxon Valdez oil spill are only some of the nightmarish environmental disasters that have made the headlines. And though environmental degradation poses a threat to our very existence on this planet, if our nation were faced with only this as its biggest threat, we would be able to consider ourselves very lucky indeed.

"Needless to say, however, the list goes on. In spite of President Bush's optimism about the state of the economy, we are in the currently in the midst of a recession. The national debt is estimated at a record high 3.5 trillion dollars, and have you heard much about the S & L bailout lately? Last summer the New York Times put the estimated cost of the bailout, which is bound to rise as days go by, in excess of the gross national product of Saudia Arabia.

"The cost of health care is spiralling out of the reach of a large percentage of the population. Homelessness is a problem for over three million Americans and is on the rise. Honda and Toyota fight tooth and nail hoping to emerge victorious as the one who will permanently replace Chrysler in the number three spot of U.S. auto sales.

"In listing America's woes I purposefully left the automakers ills for last. President Hoover's statement "what's good for GM is good for America" sums up America's economic and social direction in the twentieth century as well as any. The automobile's influence on the nation can hardly be overstated. Expansive suburbs, the demise of the nuclear family and fast food restaurants are all a result of the so called 'car culture'. The auto industry is the cornerstone of what made the nation great. Ironically, however, it is also our dependence on the automobile that is now crippling the nation in so many ways.

America's love affair with the automobile is deep because it fits in so well with our rugged-individualistic national character. How much more economic beating do we have to take and how many more Gulf Wars do we have to fight, however, before we accept the fact that it is time to find a different way to express our national identity?

"This may sound like a catastrophic thing, changing our way of life, but it doesn't have to be so. The auto industry can be gradually phased out without any traumatic damage to the economy, society or national prestige. Quite to the contrary, in fact, these could all be revived and risen to new heights.

"Before cars can be replaced, however, there must be an alternative mode of personal transportation to take its place. Lucky for us, American ingenuity has already provided us with this alternative: the chain driven, people-powered bicycle.

"Of course, that cast iron contraption constructed by the Wright brothers could never be seriously considered to be practical for the daily commute to work, could it? No! But what about those super lightweight, super strong aluminum models that have shaken the cycling world in recent years? I want every student at this college who has not already done so to go to one of the Knoxville bike shops and take one of these for a test ride. After you have done this, ask yourself if these bikes were not easier to ride than walking, not to mention infinitely more exhilarating. And fast—whoah, buddy! With its quick starts and stops, a good cyclist on one of these bikes could rival the average car in city driving.

"Typically lazy, over-weight Americans would never see bicycles as a practical means of daily transportation, but this is simply an inherited cultural bias. If a generation of Americans were raised to believe that this was the proper means for commuting to work, then putting their feet in the pedals would become just as natural as putting our feet on the pedal is for our generation. It is simply a matter of education.

"The most attractive part about this idea is that the benefits are so profound and far reaching. Undoubtedly, air and noise pollution would be drastically reduced. Being out there in direct contact with nature every day would breed

survey conducted by Mary Rose Slaughter

What do you think of sororities and fraternities on campus?

I think that they get students involved and have activities for the students. I like them. If a school has good sororities and fraternities they boost enrollment.

Lanie Cowell, Fr.

"Raspberry!"

Anonymous

I will look at campuses that do not have sororities and fraternities before I will those that do.

Potential Student

I think that this campus is too small for sororities and fraternities but I like them.

Anonymous

With the small campus, it would be just certain individuals and they would ostracize the others. They are identified too much with drinking.

Anonymous

I don't think we need them. It's too small a campus.

Frank Schubert, Sr.

It's too small a campus for them.

Kari Gregory, Jr.

No. Sororities and fraternities separate students into cliques. They emphasize more material things than educational values.

Michelle Smith, Jr.

I don't want them here because they will emphasize differences instead of similarities.

Catherine Denmark, So.

No, absolutely not.

Carrie Callaway, Jr.

No. I don't like the Idea.

Kathy North, Sr.

I think it would be a good idea to improve social life but it would have to be arranged differently because of the setting.

Mark Smelser, Sr.

I think it would divide our campus more than it already is.

Dawn Hill, So.

I think MC campus is too small for that and it would be too much of a discriminatory influence.

Karen Forbes, Sr.

I think the campus is too small. They would cause more alienation. I think it is buying friends.

Anonymous

I am opposed to them whole-heartedly. One of the problems with this campus is the strength of the cliques weakens the sense of community. The Greek system would institutionalize these cliques.

Dave Vinson, Dept. of Mathematics

Cause groups.

Craig Connaster, So.

Cause dissention, groups.

Jamie Harrison, So.

For it. Totally. The school lacks social life. Sororities and fraternities would have planned activities for the weekend.

Arthur Rindernecht, So.

I think that the principle that no student be denied access to any organization is part of MC tradition and therefore I think we have a better atmosphere on campus without them.

Arthur Bushing, Dept. of English

I don't object to them in principle, but I don't think that it would work here because the campus is so small and because MC has rules that traditionally are opposite to the regulations of sororities and fraternities.

a long lost respect for nature. Our children could once again live in 'America the Beautiful'.

"Economically we could focus on conquering the final frontier—I never said we had to stop pretending to be cowboys (see "The War Is Over?" March 1, 1991), did I? Space exploration fits in with the American myth of frontier exploration. And it is no myth that the aerospace industry is the last area which is both very profitable and where America has a great head over the other industrialized countries of the world.

"Furthermore, Americans could stop throwing their money away on automobiles—the quintessential bad investment as the average car takes up a large percentage of a person's income and never increases in value—gasoline and car repairs and begin saving again. Bicycles are low maintenance, easily repaired, and once the investment is made, they should ordinarily last a lifetime. The national economy would be relieved from an enormous burden imposed by an highway system perpetually in need of repair.

"Last of all, Americans could once again be physically healthy and strong. Corporations would undoubtedly bend over backwards to accommodate cyclist commuters as they would in turn save a fortune on health insurance, days missed from work on sick leave and gain an energetic and productive work force. Stress would be relieved. Traffic jams would be antiquated. Male impotence and female frigidity, the unspoken national nightmare, would experience a dramatic decline with the increase of all of those strong gums, firm buttocks and flat stomachs.

"Yes, both Martin Luther King Jr. and Skip have a dream. Both of our dreams involve a dramatic change in our society. And we both believe that, by its progressive example, America can lead the world to a better place."

Inter-racial friendships can be a pleasant surprise

I was sitting at my apartment steps waiting for a ride. A friend of mine and I were going to play golf later. This guy walks by and knocks on a door in my apartment complex. Evidently his friend was not at home. As he passed we exchanged mutual greetings. Very rarely do I feel so outgoing, but what the hell, it was nice out and it rubbed off, so I asked the guy to sit down for some conversation. We talked about girls, relationships, weather, golf and prejudice.

A good bit of conversation for two people who had never met, at least for me. I'm 26 and it was the first time a black guy had ever just sat down spontaneously and just B.S.'d with me. The guy was no different than anyone else. Just a friendly passing on a sunny day. I don't know if we will be friends or not because, as with most casual conversations I have, I get caught up in what we're talking about. I forgot to ask the guy's name.

Then I get a copy of the Echo and what are they talking about but integration. I think if everyone really tried to meet people (dare I say it) different from themselves, they may be pleasantly surprised. Go ahead—try it; the world will never be the same.

Don't Speak English On Saturday

by Itoi Toshinori
Echo Contributor

Have you ever been to the International House on Saturdays? It is said that the international students must speak English there during the week. On Saturdays, however, nobody speaks English there because a Japanese school, "Saturday School", as it is called by the Americans, is in session. I am a teacher at the Blount County Japanese School. This "Saturday School" is very important for the Japanese children here.

There are currently 70 Japanese children studying in Blount county's school systems during the week, but on Saturday they gather to learn Japanese writing, Chinese lettering, intensive mathematics and other studies they would ordinarily take if they were in their native country.

The state of Tennessee is eager to attract Japanese in order to enliven their its industry. That's why many Japanese corporate officers, businessmen and workers come here with their families. Some students will stay here to go to high school and college, but most students will go back to Japan after several years when their fathers have finished working here.

The children must have a difficult time adjusting to the differences between the cultures of Japan and the U.S. Suddenly, they have left their life in Japan and come to the U.S., which has a different life and culture. After coming here they do their best

Earth Day revisited

by Jeff Huffman
Echo Staff Writer

Earth Day - April 22, 1990, a celebration of the Earth and declaration for keeping it in good condition, brought environmental awareness through a series of faculty, student, and community activities.

According to Andrew McCall, Physical Plant Director, all the trees bought have been planted. Several have succumbed to the weather and other effects. The deceased are to be replaced.

Since Earth Day, campus groups have been collecting aluminum cans. Anderson Hall, the post office, the library, Crawford House, and a host of other campus offices have and are promoting paper recycling efforts.

A number of offices have recycled stationary added to their printing ammunication. Areas in the college woods have been refurbished for wildlife habitation. A number of small trees stand in front of Crawford House for the same purpose.

Bruce Builliam, Director of the Life Enrichment and of last year's Earth Day activities, says of recycling that "some days are better than others," and he added "we have a long way to go."

Guilliam gestured towards a goal of 60% of the aluminum cans getting recycled.

The Marriot Corporation of the cafeteria has stopped use of most styrofoam containers. Marriot is currently using plastic disposable salt and pepper shakers.

MC food service evaluated

by Kevin Sumner
Echo Staff Writer

Are you satisfied with the food service at Maryville College? Do you think that you are getting your money's worth? A lot of people don't think that they are. One usually hears people say things like, "I pay eleven thousand dollars a year and I should at least be able to expect to have good food." The first thing that students should know is that they do not pay eleven thousand dollars for good food. They pay one thousand eight hundred seventy five dollars for good food. Most people seem to think that that is a lot of money, but when one does a little calculating they soon begin to realize that in reality it is not.

If one were to get out one's school calendar and count the number of days that Marriott serves food, they would see that Marriott serves meals 226 days per year (freshmen who come early for orientation get served 229 days). Eight dollars twenty nine cents; that is how much it costs each student per day to eat. Is it possible for someone who is not on the meal plan to eat three meals for $8.29? Maybe. But is it possible for them to get three all-you-can-eat meals for $8.29? When one looks at it like that it's hard to complain. But there are a few more aspects that need to be addressed.

Most students are not aware that Marriott only gets about half of the money that they pay to the school for board. When $8.29 is divided by two, it becomes very difficult to eat three meals. If Marriott only gets half of the money then where does the other half go? The answer lies in the food service contract that MC has with Marriott.

In accordance with the food service contract, Marriott pays for food and employees, and MC pays for maintenance, building insurance, and energy (electric, steam, and gas). Are MC's expenses really all that much? Maybe, maybe not. Here are some factors that influence the cost: 1) Pearsons is the most expensive building on campus to operate. Most of the equipment runs on electricity and is old and inefficient; 2) Heating and cooling the dining hall is extremely expensive because it is very large and it is an old building that is difficult to insulate; 3) The food service equipment is very expensive to repair when it breaks; 4) Building insurance is expensive because of the types of equipment involved in food service. Given these factors, (and others that have not been covered) it is easier to understand why Marriott does not get all of the money allotted for board. But does Marriott receive an amount appropriate for what they are expected to provide?

Here are some of the contract specifications as found in the food service proposal:

1. Meat - USDA Choice, cut to IMP Specifications.
2. Poultry/seafood - U.S. Grade A.
3. Eggs - U.S. Grade A, Medium Size.
4. Ground Beef/Hamburger - USDA Standard or better, not to exceed 18-20% fat with no SOY ADDITIVE OR EXTENDER. All ground beef to be 100% beef.
5. Pork - USDA number 1, cured, smoked, and fresh.
6. Fresh Fruits and Vegetables - USDA No. 1.
7. Canned Fruits, Vegetables, and Juices - USDA Grade A.
8. Frozen Fruits, Vegetables, and Juices - USDA Grade A.
9. Dairy Products -
  - (a) Homogenized Whole, Skim and Chocolate Milk fortified with 400 I U Vitamin D per Quart.
  - (b) Ice Cream, other than nut and fruit to contain at least 10% butterfat.

***** Food Service Program *****

School Calculations
	Days Served	Price Per Day	Total Price
1st Semester	104	8.11	843.44	Total
Interim	19.5	9.58	186.81	Price
2nd Semester	102.5	8.23	843.575	Per Day
Total	226	*	1873.825	8.291261
			1875	8.29646

* Note the prices are different for each semester and interim.

(c) Ice Cream, with nuts and fruit to contain at least 8% butterfat.

These specifications require high quality food. Marriott has a very good reputation in the business community and is known for quality. The problems that MC has are not a result of Marriott trying to save money. Rather it has to do with what MC is paying them. Marriott is currently taking a loss on this campus.

Why would they operate at a loss? Because Marriott is trying to gain the trust of the school by providing quality service even though it cost them more than they are being paid. Once trust has been established between MC and Marriott, a long term contract can be negotiated. This will allow Marriott to make their profit over a period of several years rather than one or two. Marriott is in it for the long run. They do not try to make a quick buck and get out.

Most food service contracts are effective for five or ten years. This

New honor society for CE students

by Mary Rose Slaughter
Echo News Editor

A new honor society has been formed at MC. It is Zeta Phi, the Maryville chapter of the national organization Alpha Sigma Lambda. Zeta Phi was formed in the fall of '90. It for Continuing Education students who are going to school part-time (less than 12 hours). The society is made up of the top 10% of the students in the CE program. There will be an induction of nine new members into Zeta Phi May 3 at 7:00 p. m. in the CCM, says Wayne Osborne, president of Zeta Phi. This will increase the society's membership to 30.

Several of the programs that Zeta Phi members are a part of includes Student Advisory Council, the Mentoring Program for new CE students, and involvement with the Blount Chamber of Commerce. One of the functions of the honor society, says Osborne, is to increase communication between the community and the college.

Last Christmas, the Zeta Phi's sponsored a party to benefit the Helen Ross McNabb Center for Abused Children. All CE students were invited to attend and bring a donation or a good used toy. Through the donations and gifts collected at the party, six children received all that they had on their wish list and there were extras that Zeta Phi donated to the Center to be given to other children.

Osborne says that Zeta Phi is trying to set up a local scholarship fund to assist CE students continue their education. Some need help staying in school, some need help getting the money to start school. Alpha Sigma Lambda has a national scholarship that is available to all who are members of the honor society, but the competition is stiff for these monies.

"I hope that Zeta Phi will continue to be a prominent force at MC and in Blount County. Although our standards are high, we are looking to the future and hoping we will continue to grow," says Osborne.

Earth Day has meaning for all ... even in Maryville

by John Worth

Echo Assistant Editor

So I'm riding my bike down the road one day, minding my own business, bothering nobody, when this car/ truck thing gets behind me. Now, I'm riding up a hill, and every person who has ever ridden a bike knows that it is not very easy to stop on a hill and resume riding. So I get a major superiority complex, thinking about how this behemoth of a vehicle is polluting the atmosphere and killing a lot of trees and such things, and I smile knowing that I am in better physical condition than the genus Homo-Redneckus behind the too large steering wheel. Then this car, that has some ragged-out 454 or other large engine, begins to backfire, and I, being the paranoid, nervous person I am, think that the people in the car are shooting at me, a not too uncommon phenomenon in these parts. My head is alive with thoughts of lying dead with a headline reading "Local youth slain by angry red-necks, found wearing dirty underwear." So I stop and get off my bike and let the locomotive pass and feel very proud of myself when I manage to resume riding without much difficulty.

The point is that Earth Day is coming. I know what you're saying: "But John, what does anything you just wrote have to do with Earth Day?" or "I'm tired of hearing about Earth Day." To gain a full understanding of the meaning, ride a bike down any road in the county, any county. On every road there will be signs of litter or environmental destruction of some sort or other. Pray for that same car to pass you, the one that leaves you blinded in a carbon monoxide fog. Remember how your nose feels, and think that in some cities that smell must be coped with at every hour of everyday, and sometime in the future might be a problem here in little old Maryville. "But John," you say, "There isn't any pollution here!" Go up to the Foothills Parkway on any given warm afternoon and receive one of the most humbling experiences of your life.

Do you realize that when you see a beautiful sunset, all ablaze with colors, that pollution is the reason it is so pretty. That car that you drove up to the mountains so you could view nature, or that long distance drive from your dorm to the cafeteria or the post office is a contributor to the grossness of the world?

Sorry to be so negative. I am as guilty as most. Are you the person on the bike or the person in the car?

MC Baseball Team back on track

by Don Evon
Echo Sports Editor

Since losing six games on the road during spring break, the Maryville College Baseball Team has bounced back by winning five of its last seven outings to pull its record to within one win of .500. Currently, the Scots' record stands at 14-15 on the season.

After a discouraging spring break, the Scots were able to start pulling things back together during the second half of their 15 game road trip as they swept Emory and Henry (5-2 and 6-2) on April 4 and the University of the South (16-3 and 15-2) on April 6 before losing two games to Berry (1-6 and 0-10) the next day. From there, the Scots travelled to Nashville where they defeated Fisk by a convincing 18 run margin (25-7) on April 11.

Although Saturday's games against Centre were rained out, they will be made up on Friday, April 19 in Danville, Ky., before the Scots play the University of the South and Emory at home this weekend. The Diamondmen will conclude their regular season at home against Tusculum on Saturday, April 27 at 1 p.m., after playing Tennessee Wesleyan in Athens on April 22.

MC fans will be disappointed to learn that pitcher/short stop Clint Boling, a potential All-South candidate, will miss the rest of the season due to a rotator cuff injury. According to assistant coach Eric Etchison, however, Boling may be able to fill in as a designated hitter during the last 10 games.

Currently batting .370, Clint Boling leads the Scots' offensive attack.

Tough times for the Lady Scots

by Laquita Gernt
Echo Staff Writer

The last couple of weeks have been busy ones for the Maryville College Lady Scots Softball Team. On Friday, April 5, the Scots travelled to Fredericksburg, Va., to face three tough teams at the Mary Washington Tournament. Pitching all three games for the Scots was junior Angie Lawler. Lawler, one of the key assets to the tough MC defense, has shown "stability and good endurance throughout the season," stated catcher Nikki Boop. Although the Scots fell to Gannon 1-7 in their first game, they proved to be much more aggressive at the plate in their next outing as Shannon Nelson and Dena Godsey, both of whom have been consistent hitters for the team, each contributed with a home run apiece. In addition, Lori Chambers added two singles against the Mary Washington team, yet the Lady Scots were unable to avoid a heartbreaking 2-3 loss.

Turning to their third and final game of the tournament, the Lady Scots were trailing 1-7 as they entered the bottom of the seventh inning when they were able to put together a four run rally which ultimately brought the game to a close but unsuccessful finish.

After being rained out at home on Friday, April 12, the Scots travelled to Tusculum on April 14, and to Tennessee Tech on the 16th. Although the Maryville team was able to keep a tight hold on Tusculum throughout both games, they fell short losing 1-3 in the first game and 3-7 in the second. On a brighter note, this series saw the return of Tina Brantley, who missed three games due to a back injury.

The Scots seemed relatively pleased with their performance on Tuesday as they split a doubleheader with Tennessee Tech. According to left-fielder Jenny McCafferty, "our defense was errorless and offensively

MC musclemen place first and third in Chattanooga bodybuilding competition

by Don Evon
Echo Sports Editor

On April 13, Robert Thomas and Jared Kuka travelled to the University of Tennessee in Chattanooga to compete in their second bodybuilding contest together and both walked away carrying large trophies to show for their efforts. Thomas, 19, and Kuka, 18, both freshmen, competed against 12 other young men from around the Southeast in the teen-age division of the contest, and although this was only the second competition for either of the two men, Thomas came away with yet another first place finish, while Kuka placed third.

As you may recall, the two men also competed in a contest at William Blount High School on March 9, where Thomas won his first title.

Both men seemed to imply that they were impressed, if not even a little bit intimidated, by the size of the crowd at UTC, which they said was much larger than the crowd at the Blount county competition. Other than that, Thomas indicated that they had a much better idea of what to expect this time. Other contests that Thomas and Kuka will now consider entering include a competition in Lebanon, Tenn., in May and another in Greensboro, N.C., on June 1.

Saturday School is important for helping these Japanese children who have been living with culture conflict. We Japanese teachers, as a bridge between the U.S. and Japan, are in a position to offer them encouragement. While we are teaching the children as they would be taught in Japan, we're also trying to support their adjusting to the U.S.

When you hear the voice of Japanese children on campus, please remember the hardships and stress they must have.

provides incentive for the vender to invest large amounts of money because the contract protects their investment. If the school needs new equipment (i.e. a grill or oven) the food service vender would buy it and give it to the school. Then the vender would write it off over the length of the contract. For example, if they expect to make $50,000 profit over the next five years, then they would spend $10,000 on new equipment and make up the difference over the next five years.

At MC, however, there has been a deliberate attempt to avoid long term contracts. This has been done for a good reason. In the past MC has had some low quality food service vendors that the school was not happy with. If there had been a long term contract in effect then the school would have been locked into a food service program with the company that they were not happy with. By having a short term contract MC could "test" the company and make sure that they were going to provide the kind of service that the students want. This strategy has had a price. The kitchen equipment is old, outdated, and inefficient. It needs to be replaced, but that is expensive. With MC entering into short term contracts the cafeteria has not recieved substantial new equipment.

President Ferrin, in his memo to all students on March 7th, stated, "The food is getting better, but what can we expect for next year?" The Food Service Committee, together with Kevin Collins, our Food Service Manager, has been planning improvements in the quality and variety of food, in the appearance of the dining room, and in new kitchen equipment. Some changes should be noted when you return in the fall, while others won't be accomplished until after January 1, 1992." As the President hinted at MC and Marriott are currently in negotiations to form a long term contract. According to Dr. Wyatt, MC is looking forward to completing the negotiations and expects to get some new equipment for the kitchen (courtesy of Marriott). It was also stated that they looking into the possibility of increasing the amount of money that Marriott receives from the college. Dr. Wyatt said that they hope to increase it to around 60% of what the school charges for board. By increasing the percentage that goes to Marriott the quality of the food will increase without increasing the charge to students. Apparently President Ferrin means it when he says, "we are committed to implementing cost efficiencies wherever we can and to holding down our prices." It is also interesting to note that with all the increases in tuition there has not been an increase in the charge for board.

we had the confidence to hit.

McArthur wins alumni Outstanding Senior Award

by John Worth
Echo Ass't Editor

Every year a committee comprised of faculty, staff, and students gathers in Ellie Morrow's office to choose who will receive the Outstanding Senior award. The award was established in 1974 by the MC alumni association. The designated winner has to outgoing, studious, popular, and in the campus eye. A questionnaire is sent to the chosen applicants to find their future goals and involvement at MC after graduation.

Unlike years past, no one student stood out from the rest. In the end, Kathleen McArthur was chosen to receive the award.

Involvement with school functions was Kathy's concern for her three years at MC (she attended UT her freshman year). She was involved with the newspaper, student senate, choir and student programming.

The award came as a shock to Kathy. She did not expect that she would receive it, but was happy when she did. "I never considered myself an outstanding student," she said. "I didn't realize how much I had done until I saw it in a list!"

Kathy attributes her success to MC. "MC is my only school," she said. She continued saying she was not very involved at UT and probably never would have been. She regrets not coming to MC in her freshman year, and has no regrets about leaving UT.

Kathy is a writing/communication major, graduating in May. After graduation she, like most seniors, intends to find a job.

The other candidates were Barbara Borderieux, Eileen Freund, Troy Green, Traci Randolph and Lori Smith.

Secret societies at MC: students, faculty, administration comment on existence, activities

by Jana Dalton
Echo Staff Writer

Spades. BGs. MBs. Duds. Dukes.

These may sound like names that have been randomly selected from television sitcoms, but instead they are the titles of the secret societies that thrive, alive and well, at Maryville College. Including the Pals, a lesser known society known to congregate in protest of the secret societies, all the groups gather in private rituals to form eclectic groups of friends or, some might say, enemies.

Long standing in American social history, secret organizations have experienced fluctuations in growth and decline just as they have shifted focuses for group activities and functions. Yet from the Free Masons to the Ku Klux Klan, secret societies have influenced our social foundations. And like the Ku Klux Klan, secret societies are often associated with prejudice, violent retaliations, and exclusionary social functions.

Research into these groups on campus revealed several contradictory elements: How much does the student body really know about the societies versus what is conjecture? How much does the faculty/administration know and do they turn away? What prevents member and non-members alike from discussing secret societies?

Do they exist?

Senate president Chris Varner stated that "a lot of people don't know about secret societies." Professor Carolyn Cuddy said she "wasn't aware" of any. One non-member student anonymously claimed that "if you are in them, you don't talk about them." Professor Robert Ramger stated that he believed secret societies were "not at this time active or functioning."

Chief Eldria Hurst, a 30 year MC employee, commented that he "suspects that they [the college] have a few." Hurst said that although there had never been "any real trouble, every now and then I see their little markings everywhere. The Duds and Spades leave their insignias to insinuate that they are still active, still here," Hurst said.

Retired professor Carolyn Blair affirmed that it is "generally known" that they exist. She said she had heard references over the years.

Leslie Nier, director of student programming, candidly discussed the co-existence of fraternities / sororities with secret societies when she attended Maryville College. She also added that as a student she participated in both worlds. And three past students and current members, Vicky H., Pam Gunter, and Julie Costner resounded a firm "yes" that secret societies still very much exist. Even college president. Richard Ferrin acknowledged their presence.

But exactly how much of the mystery surrounding these chosen groups is generated as a front to conceal or intimidate members and non-members?

A panel of non-member students recently gathered to discuss the effects of secret societies on campus. All requested that their names remain confidential because they feared retaliation from the society members.

The panel complained that the exclusiveness of the groups damaged the already small campus atmosphere, particularly when the societies fueled among themselves. They also expressed dismay in dealing with individual members in a disciplinary manner, as in the dorms or on boards. Each panel member said he/she felt like he/she challenged the society as a whole rather than just one person. groups responsible for most of the physical and/or property damage done on campus in the past.

"Git' along, lil' (Scotty) dawgie..."

Yet another school year comes to a close, and that means at least one thing for everyone: change. Some students will go on to interesting summer jobs or travel; others less fortunate (or motivated) will stay at home and work at jobs that are unexciting. Likewise with the seniors, some will go on to graduate school or interesting careers. For the rest, the future is less certain.

It does not matter where the path lies for each student in the MC community, however, because with change, which is sometimes good and other times bad, there is always the opportunity for something undeniably positive—opportunity to use this hard won liberal arts education for something other than a grade, for something practical.

Many people who are not closely involved with liberal arts education think of it only as a comprehensive survey of the different areas of intellectual thought. This certainly is true of liberal arts education, but such a limited definition is missing the point. When this superfluous definition is scratched and one cuts to the chase, it becomes evident that a liberal arts education is much more substantial than that. It is, in short, intellectual training that develops independent thinking and the ability to clearly express these thoughts. This is the bottom line.

Please notice that nowhere in this broader definition is anything said about the classroom being the only place where this 'intellectual training' may, or should, occur. Contrary to what some MC students would like to believe, the world is not a microcosm of what is learned in the classroom and around campus. Rather, reality is quite the opposite of this; the MC campus, harsh though it may seem at times, is a sheltered haven.

Thus, the Echo encourages all of the MC students not to cheat themselves out of the education that they, or somebody, is paying exorbitantly, for by leaving it behind during these times of change. Be creative and find ways of taking charge of the challenging situations that will present themselves in the times to come. Use the intellectual and personal skills that have been nurtured here...the world awaits.

Letters...*Lacking Philosophy, other majors, when will MC fulfill its liberal arts purpose?

Dear Editor,

The Maryville College Statement of Purpose claims, in part, that "...the college seeks to stimulate purposeful inquiry, to encourage analytical thinking and effective expression..." Yet Philosophy, the major that would be most useful for fostering skills such as these, is not even offered. Throughout history, Philosophy has been the fertile soil from which all other disciplines of the liberal arts have sprung. Maryville College claims to be a school dedicated to the venerable tradition of the study of the liberal arts, but we have no established major in the basis of the liberal arts.

Besides Philosophy, the College has also failed to offer majors in important fields of the liberal arts such as Sociology, Physics, French, and German; however, we have managed to provide courses of study in areas that are decidedly outside the realm of the liberal arts, such as Business and Accounting, Exercise Science, Recreation, and Sports Fitness Management. In the traditional liberal arts majors we do offer, often times the departments are pitifully small with professors forced to teach courses outside their areas of expertise. Witness the Religion department. In this department, the professors are doing an exceptional job teaching Philosophy courses. The point, however, is that they shouldn't have to. The college has shown commitment in the past to providing non-traditional majors such as Athletic Training and Elementary Education. It should now provide the same commitment in offering new liberal arts majors and to expanding the present ones.

The administration argues again and again that there are not enough students who are interested in these areas to justify the expense of creating the departments. The college does not know how many students are interested in the

A different perspective: support for fraternities/sororities on campus

Dear Editor,

I am writing this letter to hopefully shed a different light on the fraternity/sorority issue that has arisen here at MC. Most students at MC have never been involved in the Greek system. All of what students "know" is from stereotypical portrayals of fraternities and sororities in the movies, or they would read only the bad press that the Greek system gets when a few members do not act responsibly. No one ever really hears about the good that fraternities and sororities, not because the good does not exist, but because it is a known fact that sensational stories sell newspapers and movies.

National fraternities and sororities are all governed by a National council, and are, therefore, subject to national rules and regulations. One such regulation deals with academics. National policy sets certain standards for G.P.A. for pledges and for initiated members. Before a student can pledge, that student must meet a certain G.P.A. then must maintain it to be initiated and remain an active member. In most chapters there are mandatory study halls for pledges, and there are often study sessions in progress. When a member's grades fall below set standards, they are given every chance to raise their G.P.A.

One thing fraternities and sororities pride themselves in is their philanthropic work. All national fraternities and sororities have a national philanthropy to which they are required to devote time or money. Some of the organizations that receive this time or money include: The Children's Miracle Network, The Salvation Army and The Helen Ross McNabb Children's Center; through activities such as collecting donations for homeless shelters, working on local telethons and delivering food baskets to needy families. Philanthropies are an important part of Greek organizations, and rarely do members hesitate to serve.

Fraternities and sororities participate in many social activities. In times past, alcohol did play a role, but in recent years national rules have prohibited alcohol at these functions. Many sororities are required to walk out of functions where alcohol is served. Fraternities are also refraining from serving alcohol because of liability costs. It is not the organization that breaks the rules. In many cases, individuals sneak alcohol into social functions; they are the ones who cause the problems. If there are infractions of alcohol policies, sanctions are imposed by school officials, national officials, or both. Sanctions include probation or revocation of a charter, which results in the closing of the chapter.

Fraternities and sororities may never work at Maryville college, and no one is going to push the issue if they are not wanted. Greek organizations give students a sense of identity with a small group in a large setting. Because MC is so small, this form of identification may not be needed. I just feel that MC students should know that the "Animal House" stereotypes of fraternities and sororities is no longer relevant. Yes, Greek organizations do have negative aspects, but I truly believe that the good outweighs the bad, and that most people benefit from their Greek ties; something a person without these Greek ties will never experience.

Sincerely,
Catherine E. Pounders
Resident Director of Lloyd Hall

Ernie says good luck to all students

Dear Editor,

I worked for the college as a security man and at the steam plant and cut grass with you students and the most thing as a friend. As we go through life we need someone to be kind and nice and cheer us up sometimes and help one another. It did not matter what color your skin was I tried to be good to all. They have cheered me up alot of times and I have helped the students alot. School and work is hard any way you do and just remember we are people, and wherever you students are, Ernie says good luck to you all, because Ernie likes you all.

majors we do not offer. This is due to the fact that these majors are not offered. In the past few years, students have complained about the lack of a Philosophy department. Yet, the administration has done little to respond to these calls and is apparently disinterested. Hence, students become discouraged and cease to complain.

Because we do not offer certain liberal arts majors, many of the prospective students who might be interested in these areas imply go elsewhere. Thus, the college fails to attract the sort of students who would want those majors in the first place. It is a classic "Catch 22" situation. Has the school become so Utilitarian in its outlook that it can only weigh the economic costs and benefits of providing a particular major? What has happened to the college's integrity? It would seem incumbent upon Maryville College, as an institution that lays claim to the great heritage of the liberal arts, to offer the majors integral to the liberal arts.

There is no problem with the college providing majors that are not found within the domain of the liberal arts. Maryville College has a duty to provide the courses of study which students want. If students want these non-traditional majors, then so be it. The college needs to remember its purpose as a liberal arts school, however. Are we going to continue paying lip-service to the idea of liberal arts or are we going to fulfill our potential as fine liberal arts institution?

Sincerely,
Jessica Roitman, So.
Christopher Ryland, So.

The tradition of secret societies at MC.

The BGs date back to the 1930s. "Bonny Gibb" was deemed the name for a group of women who had diverse backgrounds. The purpose was to be able to share the various experiences in order to grow and enrich their lives.

The MBs, nicknamed the Meatballs, originated with a band of friends who were being divided because of housing arrangements. They formed the society to ensure contact between friends and then added to this initial group.

The old adage "Call a spade a spade" is the only history known for the society of that same name.

Nier noted that the secret societies have been active on campus for 40-50 years. Dr. Ramger said there were four active societies, two for men, and two for women, when he was a student in the early 1950s. He added that there was speculation about many more.

"I was accused of being in two or three," Ramger said. He contributed the misunderstanding to "how people interpreted what secret societies were." Ramger explained that if a group of people threw a party or organized a function, whether others were invited or not or whether others attended or not, some individuals accused this group of being a secret society.

What is MC Policy?

The 1990-91 MC Student Handbook, listed under the Codes of Student Conduct, Page 19, specifically prohibits any "willful act, by a student or group of students, directed against any other individual which inflicts discomfort, pain, harm intimidation or humiliation." The participants in such groups, it continues, "will be subject to disciplinary action."

What about initiation? Is it legal?

Many friends gather on a regular basis; many more people have private parties. How can there be a problem with people of their own volition associating with whomever they choose? It is the initiation and rites of passage that distinguish an underground club from a clique. . . Members of all three women's groups recall their initiations and their feelings about it.

"I'd like to apologize to the girls that I helped initiate in 1987-88. Because now, when I think back on what we did, it's not my idea of fun," Costner said. She said she did not participate in the last two years because it was worse that when she was initiated. "I couldn't do that to anybody I know," she emphasized.

Gunter's response was more favorable. She talked of learning the legacy, meeting the old and new members, and seeing the diverse group of people. Gunter said the atmosphere was not oppressive and she "had fun."

An anonymous member recalled that "it was silly," and "I was scared."

Foreman said she was "uneasy and afraid." "The actions were designed to embarrass, or be gross, or threatening," Foreman said. Then she said she got annoyed and anxious. "I thought, what if someone did something stupid and they called the police?" Foreman remarked.

Collectively the women talked of making up skits to be performed in front of the united members and/or in a public place. Some were required to learn the Greek alphabet backwards; others had a list of items to gather, like a scavenger hunt. Some wore costumes. Some had to buy condoms and a Playgirl. All reported being blindfolded until the unveiling of the other members, and all confirmed that unlike the men's paddling test, there was no hazing.

How does one get drawn in?

The attraction appears to be the thrill of not knowing. Gunter said she found out through a "friend of a friend." "Being out of state, it was an opportunity of meeting people. MC is not very social, or at least wasn't then. It's forming new friendships that wouldn't have otherwise had a chance to develop, a great way to do so. If you're not in athletics, [you're] very limited if you don't join other groups, and they are very small. [The society] is purely social," Gunter stressed.

"Because I was asked in by someone I trusted," Costner said. She said she had no idea what it was. When she was brought to the official asking, where members had donned robes and bore candles, she said she didn't know anybody. But she thought, "what the hell," Costner said. She didn't realize other societies existed until initiation.

Foreman said she felt misled. No one answered her questions and she was intrigued by the mystery.

The anonymous member said she was speaking out to warn and protect potential students and members. She said she had "no idea it was illegal, no idea what it consisted of until it was too late."

Vicky H. was promised the "time of your life." She was told it was a fun group of people who wanted to be friends. She was also honored to be asked as a first semester student since most inductees are asked their sophomore year.

General reactions: Positive and negative

"I think that the whole element of secrecy, while having the opportunity of constructive actions but which is cloaked in secrecy, holds a strong possibility for action that is detrimental to the college," Ferrin said. "I have seen illustrations where secret societies have been helpful. I have seen other illustrations where secret societies were harmful to individuals," he added. He suggested that if "we're going to have clubs, they should be out in the open and be responsible for their actions. That is part of being a healthy adult."

Ramger advocated secret societies under the condition that their "focal point is social functions." It would infuse "esprit de corps," Ramger said. "I think that would be great. If they cause dissension or negative waves, I'm against it," he concluded. He even asserted that he would "actively campaign against" any organization that was not supportive of the college.

Nier said she saw the secret societies as a historical part of the college. "It would be sad to see something that

Creative Thesis standards are raised

by Jana Dalton
Echo Staff Writer

The creative senior thesis prerequisites now require students to achieve a 3.20 major GPA and 3.00 overall GPA. The new standards, effective at the beginning of the 1990 academic year, were spurred by the senior thesis committee's desire to better serve the students.

Paul Threadgill, chairman of the senior thesis committee, commented that the "changes were designed to put some kind of baseline to show [the student's] ability to succeed." He stressed that a creative senior thesis "takes a great deal of discipline" because it entails a "great deal more work, less structure, more responsibility on the student" than the standard senior thesis. Threadgill compared the creative thesis to a master's thesis in its complexity.

Pam Bunde, senior thesis editor and also a member of the committee, said students were undertaking a creative thesis without fully understanding the amount of work to be completed in the two semester time allotment.

"So many students were starting them and not being able to do them. Some didn't realize it involves much more work. It sounds great. But it's just not that easy," Bunde said.

One factor for the additional workload stems from the research chapter, related to the selected genre, designated as 351. The artistic work itself is then the creative chapter, 352.

Some students, Threadgill speculated, opted for a creative thesis as a means of dodging the work of a research paper but in actuality committed to greater amounts of work.

Both Bunde and Threadgill stated that the purpose of instating a GPA factor was to judge the student's ability to demonstrate discipline and motivation. These elements are generally seen in a student with an impressive GPA, and definitely necessary for a creative thesis.

The GPA could serve as a monitor of the student's drive and "stick-to-it-ness," Threadgill said.

There is an option if the artistic ability is present and the GPA isn't. The academic requirement can be waived if the student has demonstrated a "gift" or true talent, and has letters of support from his advisor and from another faculty member. The committee reviews the exceptions on a case by case basis and then decides whether the student seems qualified to undertake, and complete, the creative process.

Why would one accept such a challenge?

Mark Farmer, senior, is completing his creative S.T. this spring. His creative project is a detective novel draft and his research chapter involves the history of the police novel.

"I wouldn't have chosen any other path. Even if I could go back, I would still take the same path," Farmer said.

Farmer, a writing major, balked at the idea of completing a research paper because he wanted to do original work, and he wanted to be able to say "this is what I've done."

"I think it's better to have my own work to turn in rather than compile a research paper that is really somebody else's work," Farmer said.

Regarding the new requirements, Farmer tagged the faculty standards as "prejudiced" because they prevent students from creatively expressing what they have absorbed, even if their grades do not reflect academic excellence. He also said that the GPA requirement adds more pressure to an already stressful situation.

Dave Garzone, on the other hand, had the option of a creative thesis and

Speechwriter reaffirms UN role as peacemaker

by Ayesha Dastgir
Echo Staff Writer

Phillip Corwin was a guest speaker at the Model UN conference held at MC April 16-18. Corwin is the speechwriter for the United Nations Secretary General and a member of the United Nations Office for Research and Collection of Information.

The United Nations is an intergovernmental organization which basically does what its member states want. It is also a place for international cooperation, promotion of human rights, and an organization to coordinate global concern networks. He gave as an example that "to assess the immediate need for post war Iraq (the Secretary General authorized a UN peace keeping force) after consulting with Iraq and Kuwait."

Corwin emphasized the importance of Human Rights. So far 22 human rights conventions have been held at the UN. The most recent was the Convention on the Rights of the Child, resulting in the first ever World Summit for Children. These conventions give international credibility to make countries more aware of human rights.

According to Corwin, "When we consider ecology we consider our own future." He continued saying that (this is because we are all) "passengers on spaceship Earth." An area of concentration is helping undeveloped countries help each other ecologically. These countries would be most severely affected when oil prices rise.

Helping refugees is another area of importance. The UN Disaster Organization, the UN High Commission for Refugees are all actively involved with the refugee problem.

Regarding the future, Corwin is hopeful that the New Order would be more successful than the Old Order. He cautiously add that is only possible if something has been learned from the past. He would like "to reaffirm faith ... in nations large and small" so that collectively nations could be mobilized.

New senate president wants students involved

by Mary Rose Slaughter
Echo News Editor

As next year's Student Senate President, Howdyshell says, "I want to get the students more involved with the campus." He would like to have "town meetings" on certain issues that would include question and answer sessions with faculty and staff. Other plans are being discussed by the Senate.

The duties of the Senate president include running the meetings and certain committees, and sitting in on certain administrative functions as our student representative. Howdyshell feels that the administration listens when he has something to say while he is representing the students. He says that he is the voice of the students.

Roger Howdyshell is an Economics major. He came to MC three years ago from Logan Ohio. He hopes to go into banking when he finishes graduate school. When ask why he choose MC as a college, Howdyshell said that he and three friends saw it in a book and decided that it would be nice to go to the mountains. They all applied but he was the only one to come to MC. ## Spring musical portrays life's ups and downs

by Jeff Huffman
Echo Staff Writer

The lights reveal two symmetrical staircases that meet at white foggy curtains. A group of mimes sit all round the curtains watching one male mime portraying the birth process. The exploring infant comes to birth and grows up into young manhood. A charming dark-haired mime catches his fancy and rejects his affection. He stops and yells - "Stop the World!"

"Stop the World-- I Want to Get Off", a musical by Leslie Bricusse and Anthony Newley, shows the carousel of life as Littlechap (Michael Hatcher) is born to a life of hard work, love, parenting, and loss. His betrothed, Evie (Charlotte Borderieux), shares her life with Littlechap. She perseveres while Littlechap attempts secondary affairs with Anya of the Soviet Union, Ilse of ununited Germany, and Ginnie of the United States (all played by Borderieux).

Their life is given excellent forecasts in weather reports by David Garzone and David Kirby. Music is provided by Rhonda Mayfield on piano and Noel Goddard on bassoon. Six singers (Julie Walker, Krista Loy, Catherine Denmark, Cindy Huffstetler, and Leann Johnson) play factory workers, nag-nag singers, school children, barroom sitters, award givers, election campaigners, and the watchers of existential Littlechap.

"Stop the World-- I Want to Get Off" is a rollicking infusion of life's longings leading to learnings where the lessons are never learned until everything stops. The actors, actresses, musicians, director, and production staff put together a sober visual text, enduring and implacable.

declined when he saw the amount of research required in addition to the actual project, which was to be a play.

"I was very disappointed. Very. I wanted to do something creative that would require energies from a different part of me, but I became inundated with work, and the research became so involved that the creative senior thesis became an impossibility," Garzone lamented.

An ongoing senior thesis issue for students and faculty alike, and noted by the Bunde, is the seeming imbalance among departments. Minimum lengths and research quality requirements vary from professor to professor; and compounding the problem with an artistic endeavor makes the problem worse.

Garzone said had he known there was a minimum required page length for the research, he would have gladly continued with his creative plans.

Bunde hopes the new standards will enable the committee to screen the students and fully explain the expectations of the creative thesis so that students will be prepared for the task ahead.

Threadgill said the creative thesis is a way of "challenging your self and testing your bounds." "We want them to think carefully; we want this to be a growing experience. Not a long shot of success," Threadgill concluded.

MC Diamondmen bring season to an encouraging close

by Don Evon
Echo Sports Editor

Although the Maryville College Diamondmen dropped their final game to Tusculum 4-0, they were able to stage a strong comeback toward the end of the year in order to bring their season to an encouraging close. According to assistant coach Eric Etchison, "A 19-17 season was below our expectations. We lost a couple of key games that we should have won." Coach Etchison also seemed to suggest, however, that the team showed a lot of determination, commitment and character by turning things around during the second half of the season. The Scots were able to recover from a disappointing spring break by defeating 15 of their last 17 Division III opponents. "As far as next year is concerned," stated Coach Etchison, "we're very optimistic. We're only losing two players, and it looks like we're going to have some really good recruits coming in." In addition, the Scots' schedule will be composed solely of Division III schools next year, and 28 of their games will be played at home.

The Most Improved Player for the Diamondmen this season was junior Jason Jenkins. Jenkins, a third string shortstop/second baseman, was converted into a starting outfielder and completed the season batting .326. In addition, he committed only one error. The Coaches' Award went to senior Randy Hinton for his outstanding leadership and spot play. The Ken Stinnett Award, which is given to the most promising senior, went to Bobby Pringle who advanced to number two on the career wins list this year. With a fielding percentage of .989, Neal Pelletier received the Golden Glove Award. Pelletier also broke the school record for the most

Lady Scots sweep Wesleyan in season finale

by Laquita Gernt
Echo Staff Writer

The Lady Scots Softball Team closed their season on April 24 with two wins over Tennessee Wesleyan. Performing well at the plate and in the field, the Scots were able to end both games in the fifth inning, defeating Wesleyan 17-5 and 15-5. Although the team finished the season with a somewhat less than impressive record of nine wins and 16 losses, Coach Kandis Schram was not discouraged: "I felt good about it," she said, "I thought we did well, especially since half of the losses were by only one run."

Showing immense improvement at the plate during the latter part of the season, the Lady Scots were able to win five of their last six games. Graduating only two seniors, Peggy Bratt and Lori Chambers, Coach Schram is confident that, with good recruiting and a better schedule, the Lady Scots will have a strong team next year.

Presbyterian Moderator speaks at worship

by Mark Koerber
Echo Contributor

Price Gwynn III, Moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.), spoke at the May 7 Community Worship Service. Gwynn spoke on "Choices" urging those in attendance to a mature faith that avoids simplistic answers to life's challenges. "You are the hands of God," Gwynn stated "Let us make the church together."

Gwynn has served on numerous local, regional and national church committees of the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.); has served on the boards of many community service organizations; and as Vice-President of Lance, Inc. he has worked to remove the fats and tropical oils from Lance Snack products.

Although attendance by students was low, several prominent people were present. Among those who attended are: Dr. Duncan S. Ferguson, Director of the Committee on Higher Education for the Presbyterian Church (USA); Reverend Frank E. Jump, Moderator of the East Tennessee Presbytery; and Reverend James Wilbanks, Acting Executive Presbytery and Stated Clerk of the Presbytery of East Tennessee.

has been around for many years die out." She said that as long as the societies were not being disrespectful, she saw no need to "ferret them out." She cautioned, however, that if she saw disrespectful actions she would indeed take necessary action.

Gunter expressed her opinion of the purpose and function of a secret society. "I think societies perform a needed function on campus which is a social outlet. It's a way for freshman to become better adjusted, to do things and a wonderful opportunity to break down social barriers. They also form lasting relationships. I have two dozen friends that graduated who have fallen by the wayside. I know a dozen or so or members who have graduated and we've kept in contact." Gunter said. She said she agreed to be interviewed because her "intention is not to say 'hey this is bad,' but this is what it's all about and 'it's GOOD thing.'"

"I hope to dispel some of the misconceptions about societies," Vicky H. seconded Gunter. "It's a college memory. People who are in our group I wouldn't normally have made friends with. There were barriers we overcame through the society to become friends." said Vicky H.

Foreman was opposed to exclusionary groups. She said she had seen girls "squashed, emotionally messed up because of the exclusion. What's the point to invent friendships that are shallow and fake. I had no sense of acceptance. The only purpose of a society is to feel accepted. With my friends I knew they wanted me around," Foreman said. She was also opposed to sororities but conceded that at least they had a redeeming quality of some community service. She said she perceived the secret society to be a place to "party only."

Costner said societies "stunt[ed] to personal growth" and "didn't value her opinion." "I think as a whole secret societies are not very productive. The only way they might be productive is through contacts with alumni who might be successful. I think it prevents people from being who they really want to be. Considering your-

Here to stay?

They do exist at Maryville College. They must serve some function or they would have died out much like their Greek counterparts did in the 1970s. Their signs are obvious to those who know what to look for. Notice the carnations at graduation. Notice your friends who seem to be lying when they suddenly have to disappear one night. Notice the red footprints now adorning, or scarring the campus.

Secret societies continue to flourish right under our noses. But one thing is for certain; they are not such a secret anymore.

'Differences' mark the beginning of a new academic year at MC

by Mary Rose Slaughter
Echo Staff

"Differences" was the theme of the annual Maryville College Fall Convocation on Sept. 5 in Wilson Chapel. The theme this year was the differences among those who make up the college community.

President Richard Ferrin's address: "What's the Difference?" compared the differences among people in the college community. He used as an example many times the differences between the hearing and the hearing impaired. Ferrin said that we all hear, although in different ways.

"We sometimes have not handled these differences very well," but MC is continuing to work on hearing all the voices and using them to guide the decisions made on campus, Ferrin said.

Ferrin went on to say that there are differences in gender, nationalities, ethnic backgrounds, economic backgrounds, past experiences and future goals on campus, and these differences bring different ideas to MC.

"There's room [on campus] for encouraging all ideas. The goal is not to celebrate the differences but to incorporate them into daily living." Even though some differences are more obvious than others, Ferrin said, "the goal is to communicate." He warned against mocking the differences and urged the campus community to use them to its advantage. "Each of us (student body, faculty, staff, and alumni) is living out the Maryville experience no matter how we do it," Ferrin said.

Prior to his speech, Ferrin recognized last year's outstanding college faculty and staff. Irma K. Young was given the Distinguished Service Award for 1991-92 for Outstanding Contributions in a Chosen Profession. Young was chosen for this award "for her role in the development and guidance of the sign language interpreting program at MC." MC was one of the first colleges in the nation to implement a four-year degree program in Sign Language Interpreting. Young also has been on many committees and panels dealing with problems of the hearing impaired.

Dr. Harry Howard, professor of political science, was awarded the Outstanding Faculty Award for 1990-91, and Dr. Mary Kay Sullivan, assistant professor of management, was runner-up. The Outstanding Staff Award went to Linda Moore of the admissions office; the Outstanding Administrator Award to Andy McCall, director of the physical plant; and the Sharon A. Murphy Crane Distinguished Service Award to Cookie Gose, manager of the MC print shop.

The ceremonies included the usual procession of the faculty and staff, this year to the music of Bach's "Let Heaven and Earth Rejoice," performed by Dr. James Bloy, professor of music, on the pipe organ. He was joined by Dr. Larry Smithee, assistant professor of music, on the trumpet in "Rondeau," a piece by Mouret. Dr. Robert Ramger, associate professor of biology, led the opening prayer, and Dr. Sue Wyatt, vice president for student development, in her words of welcome to students quoted from an 1886 issue of "College Days": "Never has MC entered upon a new year with higher aims or brighter prospects. ## What's new at MC? Bonner Scholarships, Interim Changes, Self-Study highlight the year to come

by Michelle Hall
Echo Staff

The 1991-92 school year will be accompanied by several "firsts" for Maryville College students. Twenty-nine freshmen will be among the first Bonner Scholars to attend MC. Students will participate in the new experiential education program for the first time this year, and in the midst of all these "firsts," MC will undergo a year-long Self Study in preparation for its accreditation review.

The Bonner Scholarship Program is sponsored by Bertrand Bonner who established the Bonner Foundation with two goals in mind: to help students who might not otherwise be able to attend Maryville College and to encourage them to be of service to their community.

MC is one of twelve southeastern colleges participating in the program. Twenty-five freshman students from each school will receive the four-year scholarship worth approximately $3,000 per year. In exchange, the scholars will do 10 hours each week of community service during the school year and 240 hours total during the summer.

"In essence, for many, this will be their job," states Maryville College President Dr. Richard Ferrin, adding that MC "has a real heritage of turning out people with a mindset of service."

In addition to the new scholarship program, MC has a new experiential See New p. 8

From the Staff, the Echo Editorial...

The Highland Echo begins a new academic year with a renewed and vigorous effort to serve its readers. Our look may be the same but our staff and leadership have been altered in both traditional and experimental ways. For this reason, we thought that you who read us—students, faculty, staff and alumni would be interested in how the Echo will be produced for you this year.

Through the normal means of attrition due to graduation and other interests, some of last year's staff have moved on and we wish them the best in their endeavors. But many of us are returning for a second and even a third year with the Echo. And several of us are joining the staff of the Echo for the first time.

This year staffers will be divided into two distinct teams, one of which will report and write the news and feature articles arising from campus events, and the other of which will lay out and paste up the paper for publication by the Maryville/Alcoa Daily Times.

The reportorial team consists mainly of members of the English 217 news and magazine writing class. Those of us in this class who are working to bring campus news to you are also learning on the job, and we hope that you will be patient in your encounters with us, especially when we visit you or phone you a second or third time in order to make sure that our facts are correct or to get that all-important quote that the story needs.

The layout team consists of veteran staffers who have produced the Echo in past years under less-than-desireable circumstances, including the resignation of editors, a lack of material and staffing and uncertain budgets, but who have shown much devotion to the newspaper by returning again to help us keep you informed about Maryville College.

We staffers, both veterans and initiates, are a small group among the student body, and we wish that we were larger, much larger! But whether you wish to join us in our efforts or not, we depend upon you for support as we go about our daily tasks of gathering and reporting the news, and we welcome your comments and suggestions, for the Echo has always been responsive to its readers. And why not? We are all part of the community that is Maryville College.

The Echo, as always, continues to stand for that most important of freedoms involving the written and spoken word. As staffers, old and new, we wish to support Maryville College in all that it does. But even as we carry its name on our masthead, we must above all try to tell the truth as best we can. We hope that you will join us in supporting both of these goals.

MC welcomes new faces to the faculty for 1991-92

by Missy Flaherty
Echo Staff

Maryville College has five new faculty members this year. Two of the new faces are in Fine Arts: Dr. Larry Smithee joins the faculty as assistant professor of music, and Jill Bergeron as instructor in theater. Dr. Lynnette Sievert joins the faculty as an assistant professor of biology and Linda Chesser is a visiting instructor in the department of mathematics and computer science. Christine Nugent is MC's newest reference librarian.

Smithee received his bachelor's and master's degrees in music education from Arkansas State University, and his Ed.D. degree from Washington State University in St. Louis. Smithee comes to us from a teaching position at the University of Southern Colorado and he and his family were anxious to get "back home" to the south. He is interested in "getting the band program off to a good start, and getting the MC students more involved, as well." He is a trumpeter, and enjoys outdoor activities and reading.

Jill Bergeron is instructor in theater. She received her bachelor's degree from Emory and Henry College, which is one of the reasons she came to MC. "MC is a lot like Emory and Henry....it has the same type of atmosphere," she said. Bergeron received her M.A. degree and her A.B.D. status at Louisiana State University. Some of her aspirations for the theater department are to organize a drama ministry and the dramatic fraternity Alpha Psi Omega. Her duties will also include directing plays. This fall's production will be a fast-paced comedy, "Lend Me A Tenor."

MC's new assistant professor of biology is a graduate of Buena Vista College and received her master's degree in biology from Eastern Kentucky University. Sievert has a doctorate in zoology from the University of Oklahoma, and has been doing post-doctorate research at Auburn University. Sievert's hobbies include cross-stitch and gardening.

Chesser holds a master's degree in mathematics from the University of Alabama. She has done graduate work in the math department at the University of Tennessee, and she has taught at the University of Pittsburgh at Titusville, Pa.

Nugent has joined MC as reference librarian. She was born in Germany and attended the University of Hamburg and Ludwig-Maximilians University. She received a bachelor's degree from East Texas State University, and a master's in library science from the University of Tennessee in Knoxville.

Nugent was also a practicum student at MC. She said she is looking forward to being "involved in the whole aspect of the college community and also working with the students." Some of her hobbies are sewing, silk painting, music, outdoors, photography and reading.

An ex-Inquiry teacher tells all: survival at MC

by Dr. Scott Brunger
Guest Columnist

My last Inquiry class was so long ago that most of my former freshman students have now graduated. As a result I can reveal stories of success and failure that may guide current freshman students to the summits and away from the pitfalls of the college experience. (Names have been changed to protect the innocent.)

The hardest thing about being a teacher is to watch talented students mess up. Henry's family was rich, so he did not have to work. They gave him a new truck for college. He gave it a girl's name and wasted twenty gallons of gas a week, even though he lived in the dorms. When I called him about missing class, his stereo made it hard to hear his voice.

"How can you study?" I asked, trying to sound helpful.

"I am just taking a break," he always answered.

When he tore the transmission out of his truck, his parents delayed repairs to see if he could improve his grades by staying on campus. He flunked out in his freshman year.

Some students succeed against all my expectations. Derek stumbled into my office with his shoes untied. He wanted a portfolio project; any project would do.

I gulped, "What do you have in mind?"

"Well, I never have enough money."

"Where do you spend it?"

"At the mall."

"When you go to the mall, do you know what you want to buy?"

"No."

I could see we had a problem there that would challenge an economist's belief in human rationality. Despite my misgiving that someone could start the day with thirty dollars in his wallet and end it broke with no idea where the money went, we set up a budget and accounting system. Derek used it faithfully. Soon he discovered that to avoid spending all his allowance uselessly at the mall, he had to find different friends who did not support that behavior. When he did so, he found time to study, instead of hanging out at the mall. He began to earn B's. By his sophomore year he would come to advising sessions with his course program carefully worked out for the remaining years of school.

Students arrive with very high expectations. Miriam told me that she wanted to make $100,000 a year after graduation.

I asked her if she knew anyone who made that much. Her mother was a nurse and her father an ex-serviceman. She did not want to live the way her family had. No one she knew made that much.

"How would you want to earn your income?"

"I don't know."

I asked if she was pre-med, but she did not like biology. I asked if she would want to be a certified public accountant, but she hated mathematics. I asked about computers, but she was afraid of them. I asked her if she wanted to be a saleswoman, but she did not like meeting strangers. I asked her if she wanted a family and she did.

"You have to work hard to earn $100,000. How does that fit in with marriage and raising children?"

"I don't know."

She eventually majored in technical writing, because she enjoys it and can make a lot of money if she takes on a lot of work.

Other students seek weird role models. Rebecca told me her goal was to become an MC cheerleader.

"Fine," I said. She was pretty and had a loud voice.

"But I am not strong enough. I need to work out."

"Good," I said. "See an athletic trainer about it." To make her an informed consumer, I found a book on women's weight training and suggested it to her.

She ignored the book. Instead she went to the weightroom and sought advice from the football linemen. Soon she had noticeable biceps and a heavy gait.

I asked her who the trainer was. He was the nosetackle. I called the Physical Education Department for help.

Rebecca switched to more sets of repetitions with smaller weights and developed the flexibility to make the team.

My worst frustration as an Inquiry teacher was discovering that academic problems, which I concentrate on, are related to psychological, religious, family, sexual, and roommate problems, which I consider very messy. Fortunately freshman personalities are sufficiently resilient that they can find their own way if we listen patiently. Unfortunately freshman students experiment with immature solutions until they find the one for them.

New Chaplain desires campus involvement in community service, pans mandatory worship

by Lance Klosterman
Echo Staff

The new academic year has brought many new freshman students and faculty members to the college. A most recent addition to the staff is Stephen Nickle, our new chaplain. This graduate of Princeton University and Columbia Theological Seminary comes to us from northern Georgia.

"I just came from Piedmont College in Demorest. I was chaplain there for four years," Nickle said. Nickle lived there with his family. His wife Catherine is a therapist and counselor and they have a two-year old son, Christopher. Another child is due in early October.

Because this is his first year at Maryville College, Nickle is adopting a wait and see attitude until he gets his bearings.

"Initially my plans are to get a sense of what already is in place. Learn the liturgy that is already here....Find out what traditions there are and what people are already doing in terms of the ministry of this campus," he said.

After he is more familiar with the people of Maryville College, Nickle plans to encourage students to participate actively in community service.

"I hope to facilitate opportunities for community service and get folks involved with that who haven't had the chance to or never had the thought to get involved. For those already involved in community service, [I hope] to facilitate some kind of reflection on it," Nickle explained.

Nickle is also in charge of directing the Bonner Scholar program, which is focused on community service.

"I understand the Christian agenda as a struggle of making meaning and making sense of the world...having a sense of God and who God is. People are struggling toward understanding who they are in the world. That is the reflection end of acting and reflecting through community service," he said.

He is pleased that there are so many active religious groups on campus, including the Fellowship of Christian Athletes (FCA), the Baptist Student Union (BSU), Presbyterian Fellowship, Amnesty International and Habitat for Humanity.

"I think there is something good about a lot of different flavors or a lot of different ways you can plug into this faith struggle. Someone who's not comfortable with Presbyterian Fellowship may be very comfortable with Habitat for Humanity," Nickle said. "We have community worship Tuesdays at 11:30 a.m., and there are a flock of different Bible studies going on. I would like to see some common effort where all groups join in something."

Nickle had a negative response to the question of mandatory worship.

"I doubt seriously whether worship can be mandated. You can mandate the physical presence but you can't mandate worship. I've been in a situation where there's been mandatory attendance at chapel services and it ruins it for those who want to be there."

Nickle wants to invite anyone who wishes to participate in his daily campus devotional every morning at 8:30.

"I'm enjoying myself here," he said. "I'm meeting a lot of creative folks, very exciting folks. I find the faculty and staff are creative and exciting, too. The student body just seems excellent to me."

Dormitory life to undergo changes

Stephen Williams
Echo Staff

College involves mostly going to classes, studying, and ultimately getting a degree in a certain discipline. Some people follow this path religiously; others follow it very loosely. In whatever way we deal with our college experience, there is one aspect that is never overlooked. That aspect is life in the dorm. What can we as Maryville College dorm residents expect this year? Let's take a look.

Over the summer many of the rules, and the people who make the rules, have changed. Those of you who came back looking for Leslie Nier in Student Development found Marcia Gibson. She is now director of student life. Gibson hails from the Detroit, where she worked at four different colleges. Gibson holds a master's degree in counseling and student personnel.

In her plans for dorm life at MC, Gibson shows great concern for the "safety, security, health and welfare of the students." Gibson displayed her concern by helping to rewrite some policies that were unclear in the Student Handbook and create new policies for dorms that had potential security problems, such as Lloyd. For all those who live in Lloyd, leaving the doors propped open can cost a pretty penny in fines nowadays.

Another dorm that had a problem is Pearsons. The problem was that the alcohol policy of that dorm was not clear to some of the residents. The rule is that minors are not allowed to be in the presence of alcohol. So to keep Pearsons from becoming the "party place" for underaged drinkers, the policy now states that if a minor is found to be in the presence of or drinking alcohol in the room of a Pearsons resident, not only will the minor be in trouble but the resident of the room in which he/she was drinking will be asked to leave the dorm permanently.

But Gibson is not here just to impose rules on students. She has some interesting plans for programming. In the past, student programming lacked in participation and variety. We had Spring Fling and Mardi Gras and all of those other ethereal experiences (and I'm not knocking them). We had a number of speakers come to us from our country as well as from others. But we as a campus, a college, lacked programming that brought us together as a family. Most of us have our little cliques, or a certain group of friends that we hang out with. In the past it seemed that this was the way that programming was set up. It seemed as if the event was geared for a certain group of people. According to Gibson's plans for student programming, all that is about to go out the window.

Gibson, as well as the resident directors (RDs) in every dorm, want to create programming that will not only provide recreation for students, but also education, cultural awareness and appreciation of ideas and people. Social programming (other than dances) will bring students together, and developmental programming will help students in their college experience. Basically, programming will be aimed at all students.

Not only is this attitude of oneness aimed at the entire campus but also at each individual dorm. Larry Erwin, the RD of Gamble Hall, said, "I want to change the image of Gamble. I want people to know that human beings, not animals, live in this dorm. I want to change the 'party dorm' image that Gamble has acquired for itself. I mean, yes, there are a lot of athletes here, but they're not stupid jocks. They have to make good grades like everyone else on this campus, and to do that they have to study."

Erwin has developed a G-MAN model of behavior for the residents of Gamble. This model is based on loyalty, tolerance and understanding among those students who live in Gamble and for those who do not. Although the coming trend is for students of MC to come together as a whole, Erwin also believes that individual groups should work on togetherness, especially African American students.

Erwin said, "I really believe in the wholeness of the community here at Maryville, but I also believe in supporting the different sects that make up the community. I feel a need for support within these groups as well as from outside. I really like the friendship and the caring attitude that is displayed within the Japanese community. It shows that even though they may not have much support from many American students, they realize that they have each other. I would like to see that attitude in the black community. I don't like the quibbling and arguing among the brothers and sisters at this school. It really saddens me."

Another new face on the MC campus is Mark Cate, the RD of Copeland. Cate is a native of Maryville and is taking a semester off to do work here and to do some student teaching. Cate is not planning any drastic changes for Copeland. As a matter of fact, things will not change much at all as far as dorm policy is concerned.

"My staff will be in the forefront of enforcement. I am here to back them up. This dorm will follow the policies given in the Student Handbook but my staff and I will not be overbearing. There won't be any snooping around or spying, but we will deal with problems as they arise,"

Cate said. As far as new programming for Copeland, Cate said, "Interdorm activities will be left up to my staff and the residents of Copeland. I know we've discussed athletic contests and pizza parties but have decided on nothing at this time."

In Pearsons, Cathy Pounders is the new RD. Cathy hopes to contribute to Gibson's master plan by helping to originate programming that will aid graduating students with their job skills and help them find jobs. Pounders also works in the student development office. She says of her job there, "It's a big responsibility and it keeps me busy. I'm enjoying it though."

All in all the 1991-92 school year will see some exciting changes in dorm life and activities. Hopefully we as a campus and a FAMILY will make an effort to flow with the coming trends.

MC to upgrade computer system

by Lee Fersner
Echo Staff

What? New Computers! Maryville College has received funding for new computers. Two sources have donated money for the updated computerization of the campus. The first source is the Alcoa Foundation, which contributed money for faculty computers, and the second source is the Tutt and Elizabeth Bradford fund. The Bradford money will go towards the computer labs. Other grants are going to be pursued later on from other companies, such as A.T.&T. Dr. John Nichols, professor of math and computer science, will be managing the new computerization, which he describes as moving forward under a "three year plan." In the first year there will be computers on 19 faculty members' desks, and the computer science lab in Sutton will be improved and updated. In the second year the college will have the open labs in Sutton and Anderson Hall upgraded. The final year calls for completing the faculty computerization process with the Alcoa money and other sources.

The computers will be networked and faculty will be brought on line as they receive computers. Ultimately the student body will also be brought on line. The library will eventually become part of the system.

The new computers are going to be 386-based machines, which

Nichols said are the best ones on the market for the money. When asked how long before new computers have to be updated again, Nichols said, "We use the computers until they die."

The entire budget for the three-year plan is uncertain at the moment, but $20,000 for the faculty comes from the Alcoa Foundation and the Bradford fund, the exact figure of which has yet to be released, is said to be in excess of $80,000.

The advantages that computerization will have for the students are that the majors will get up-to-date equipment, and the rest of the student body will have easier access to computers because there will be more available.

The advantage for the faculty is that everything is made a little easier, including research, record keeping and test writing. The faculty will also be able to begin academic advising using computers as early as next spring.

New Open Computer Lab Hours and Procedures

The college's Open Computer Labs are located in Sutton Science 204 and in Anderson Hall 306. They are available to all students who have paid their activities fee. Software available in Sutton includes Wordperfect 5.1, Quattro (a LOTUS clone), Foxbase (a dBASE III clone), Basic, Statpak, and Derive (a math package). Software available in Anderson includes Wordperfect 5.1, Pagemaker 4.0 (a desktop publishing program), Windows Paintbrush, and Microsoft Excel (a spreadsheet). The two labs are compatible and include a menu driven operating system. All persons using the labs must understand the lab procedures and know how to use the software. First time users should buy a 3.5 inch diskette at the bookstore and should be aware that high density diskettes can be used only in the Anderson lab, while low density diskettes can be used in both labs. First time users should also go to the labs after 4 p.m., when lab assistants are available to assist you. For further information call Dr. Nichols, ext. 8276 or Dr. Butts, ext. 8243.

Procedural changes have been made in both labs. Please read the instructions posted in the labs and follow the instructions of the lab assistants.

Initial 'reports from the field' deal with Hong Kong, China and Kenya

by Martin Lin
Echo Staff

On Tuesday, September 11 1991, this year's first reports from the field were presented at noon in Pearsons Dining Room. The first speaker was Margie Dietz, who spent two months of her summer break in Kenya. The second speaker was Dr. Scott Brunger who had revisited Hong Kong and the People's Republic of China where he had spent part of his childhood.

Dietz, a Maryville College student from Jefferson City, Tenn., talked about her experiences in Kenya with Intervarsity, a Christian organization which plans trips for students to foreign countries.

Her group, seventeen other students and five staff people who assisted them in transportation and assignments, stayed in Ngong Hills outside of Nairobi, the capital of Kenya. Her assignments and experiences, illustrated through an effective and interesting slide show, were mainly manual labor such as painting and helping missionaries with their work. The main benefit, however, was to experience a completely different lifestyle and culture, Dietz said.

Dietz also stated in an interview that while staying with foreign missionaries near Mombasa, she felt that there was a lack of communication and friendship between the missionaries and the native Kenyans.

Overall, however, Dietz said that she felt very positive about the decision to go to Kenya and would definitely recommend the trip to other students who would be interested.

Brunger, a social science professor at Maryville College, also presented an interesting slide show from his summer vacation in Hong Kong and the People's Republic of China. While traveling through South China, Brunger said he visited missionary stations and commercial trade zones.

Brunger brought "Reports from the Field" to a close with a presentation of data about China's history and its social and economic structure.

Counseling, consultation, tutoring and study tables now offered by MC Learning Center

by Sam Waycaster
Echo staff

Under the supervision of Director Vandy Beard and Assistant Director Margie Ribble, The Maryville College Learning Center provides academic support services to college students as well as to area public school students who enroll at the center on a private basis.

The Learning Center, located on the second floor of the Wilson Chapel Complex, offers a variety of programs designed to assist students in their academic studies. The programs which are offered to college students include: counseling and consultation services concerning academic matters, coordination of Study Table Peer Tutoring, and one-on-one private tutoring when help from the study tables does not provide enough assistance.

Some of the services which the center provides to grades K-12 are as follows: a media center with resources for parents and teachers of intellectually gifted children; camps, workshops, and courses in areas of enrichment for elementary students; study groups for middle and high school students (a program offered for the first time this year); assessment and consultation services to parents and children; and one-on-one tutoring by request of the parents. Beard suggests that parents play a large role in developing the programs, along with the Learning Center staff, to meet the educational needs of the student.

Changes and improvements that have been made to the learning center for the 1991-92 academic year include the addition of the study tables as a direct link to the center. The tables are located in Sutton Science Center rooms 101-103, and are available from 7:30 - 9:30 p.m. Monday through Thursday. Assistance is offered on Monday and Wednesday for statistics, English, psychology, pre-calculus, and calculus; Tuesday and Thursday for algebra, statistics, chemistry, Spanish, and accounting. Assistance with other courses is "on call" and may be made available by calling ext. 8275 before noon on either day that the tables are offered.

Study tables are staffed with experienced, trained tutors who have mastered the subjects for which they provide help. Peer tutors are chosen by recommendation of professors from each department. "I was delighted when the college made the decision for us [the Learning Center staff] to start doing the study tables," Beard said.

Another of the new programs offered is the identification of incoming freshmen who may be at high risk in their ability to understand some of their college courses. The Learning Center staff have targeted the students with lower grade point averages and test scores and outlined specifically the services that are offered in order for these students to gain additional assistance if necessary.

In addition, the Learning Center works closely with learning disabled students to determine if they possess a significant need for improvement. Some students with learning disabilities enter college legally handicapped. Beard suggested that these students may not require the extra assistance although it is made readily available for them. "Through high school they learned to compensate for their disability and they are going to be successful college students," she said. She also emphasized that learning disabled students are handled exactly the same as other students who begin the programs. "If help is requested, the center provides it, just as it would for any other student who chooses to participate in our programs. Learning disabled students have particular problems with college work and require more one-on-one consultation and tutoring," she said. Beard added that sometimes the student has problems with organizational skills such as time management rather than with specific course work.

Learning disabled students are notified upon acceptance to the college that they are entitled to any of the services the Learning Center has to offer. Learning disabled students are also entitled to special modifications in the classroom. They are required to complete course work just like any other student, but sometimes a problem may arise. Beard gives an example: "If a learning disabled student has a disability that involves difficulty in completing work in a set period of time, we will ask the professor to give extensions on test time or assignment time, and for a student that is legally handicapped, that is an appropriate request. The faculty here is very cooperative about working with those special students."

The Learning Center staff suggests that it is vitally important that students seek help from their professors early in the semester if they suspect a problem. The Learning Center will then work with the student as well as his or her professor to provide additional help if necessary.

For more information, students may contact the Learning Center by calling ext. 8121, 8123, or 8124. An answering machine is provided in the center after hours and students are encouraged to leave queries concerning tutoring. Students may also contact Vandy Beard at ext. 8123 or Margie Ribble at ext. 8275.

MC student participates in U.S. Dept. of Energy research program

A Maryville College senior was one of 49 students to take part in the U.S. Department of Energy's Research Participation program this summer.

Senior Marcelite Ailor took part in the program sponsored by DOE's Office of Energy Research and operated by Oak Ridge Associated Universities' Science/Engineering Education Division.

On a day-to-day basis students such as Ailor collaborate with federal researchers using state-of-the-art equipment not usually found in most campus labs.

Students in the program have said that they "gained a better view of the inner workings of groups and group dynamics," became "more aware of the importance of innovation, dedication, and pride," and "gained extensive knowledge of project management policies."

The program is open to graduate and upper division undergraduate students majoring in engineering, physical sciences, mathematics, computer science, or the social sciences. Applications outnumber appointments by four to one.

For more information about this program, students should contact Dr. Robert Naylor, ext. 8278

Soccer teams seek unity in aiming at nationals

by Robin Morris
Echo Staff

Last season, the Maryville College men's and women's soccer teams came close to competing in the nationals. This season, both teams have a good chance of qualifying for the 1991 National Tournament. The men's team is 4-2 so far, and the Lady Scots are 3-0.

Pepe Fernandez, head coach of both teams, stresses the importance of team unity when he considers tournament possibilities. "The team has to be united and do the little things that make a good team a great team," Fernandez said.

Although the Lady Scots have few players, they are all strong players. But Fernandez does not think the lack of players is a major disadvantage for the team. "As long as they stay healthy, it won't be a problem," he said.

The men's team has a strong sense of unity this season. "The difference in the team this year is that we are depending less on one person and more on team effort," said Ben Sohrabi, who along with Patrick Hagerty is co-captain of the team.

Sohrabi went on to say that this year the scoring for the team has to be balanced by the whole team. One of the problems last season, Sohrabi thinks, is that there were only a few players who were depended on to make goals.

The Lady Scots have defeated Lees McRae 2-0 and Tennessee Wesleyan 7-1. Pam Russell scored both goals in the Lees McRae game without an assist. Jennifer Wells had a hat trick in the Tennessee Wesleyan game. Wells was assisted twice by Pam Russell. Wells also assisted Kelly Smelser's two goals. Julie Dingles also scored twice in the game.

The men defeated Cumberland University, lost to King College 1-2, and defeated both Tennessee Wesleyan 4-1 and Belmont University 8-1. In the Cumberland game, Ali Sohrabi scored two goals while Todd Tompkins and Dale Allen each scored once. Michael Smelser had two assists. Ali Sohrabi scored the goal against King without an assist. At the Tennessee Wesleyan game, Chad Brown scored two of the goals, one was assisted by Cam Dodson. Todd Tompkins scored an

Apparent weaknesses may be strengths for Scots volleyball

by Matt Osborne
Echo Staff

At first glance, the 1991 Lady Scots volleyball team would seem to be in big trouble. With only one player over 5'10", and with nine underclassmen on a team of thirteen, there is the temptation to call this season a 'rebuilding' time. But Coach Kandis Schram is certain that the weaknesses their opponents see are truly the team's strength.

"I like to call them 'my little monkeys,'" she explained. "They're small, but they're very quick and full of energy."

Schram said that the energy level is necessary, since the team will have to rely on defense. "They go after every ball, even the ones they shouldn't go after, and they get under the balls that hit the floor too easily last year."

Schram explained that coaching "goes in cycles. Every few seasons, you have to rebuild and find new leaders. Right now we're in that rebuilding cycle, but I expect we'll be a real sleeper this year." She points to the team's first tournament at Greensboro, S.C., as an indicator for the rest of the season. The Lady Scots will play against three nationally ranked teams. "I think we'll go there and surprise people," she says with a grin; "some teams out there are really in for a shock."

When asked about team leaders, Schram responded that there were no real leader-types on the team. "No-one is standing up and saying 'let's go,' our attitude is more like the whole team saying 'let's go.'"

After the upcoming tourney, Maryville meets Bryan College at home on Sept. 17, and then has another tournament on the 20th before returning home against Tusculum College on the 23rd.

As of this writing, the Lady Scots are 2-3. Although they beat Greensboro, the No. 1-ranked team in the South Region last season, in the Greensboro Invitational, they lost to Mary Washington and to Guilford in the same tournament.

MC's middle hitter Tonya DeWitt was an all-tournament team selection.

YES! The Maryville College Scots men's and women's soccer teams must have more of this if they are to have a chance at the nationals this year.

unassisted goal and Dale Allen scored the final goal without an assist. At the Belmont game, Stian Jordalen scored a goal assisted by Joel Harris. Kenan Williams scored a goal assisted by Mike Vaughn, and Ben Sohrabi scored two goals assisted by Patrick Mumpower and Tompkins. Ali Sohrabi scored a goal assisted by Smelser, Brian Oyemarte scored one assisted by Ben Sohrabi, and Tompkins scored two goals assisted by Ali Sohrabi and Dodson.

Fernandez believes that the teams have a chance to be stronger than they were last year if they can unite and play as a units. "The key of a team is how good the leadership is and how well people follow that leadership" Fernandez said.

Scott Snyder, assistant coach, is optimistic about the season. "The team looks to break the tournament jinx and finally qualify for the nationals," Snyder said. He went on to say that the only problems that are existent this season are lack of depth in the women's team and lack of experience in certain positions on the men's team.

Despite these obstacles both teams are very promising and show remarkable strength and passion on the field, according to Snyder.

New from p. 1

tial education program replacing the interim program. Formerly, the requirement was satisfied with two on-campus interims, one of which had to be experiential, and one off-campus interim. The experiential learning requirement may be satisfied by completion of an experiential course offered during the January or May term, a semester course designed to be experiential and approved by the Experiential Education Committee, an off-campus internship, three credit hours in the MCLife Enrichment Program (portfolio), three credit hours in Mountain Challenge, or a semester of study abroad.

Academic Vice President Dr. Dean Boldon cites the new system's flexibility as a major advantage. He notes that it will offer more options in semester-long experiential education and will open the January term for more academic courses.

The main disadvantage of the former program, Boldon said, is that it was "both a time requirement and a course requirement."

"The new program offers more ways of satisfying the interim requirement with a focus on experiential education," he added.

A Self Study will also accompany the 1991-92 school year. The Self Study will be conducted in preparation of the Reaffirmation Committee visit conducted in the spring of 1993 by the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools (SACS), MC's regional accrediting agency.

Every ten years a nine-member SACS committee examines all aspects of MC in two days of intense review to determine if MC is meeting SACS criteria for a member school. After the visit, SACS will make recommendations, MC will respond to them, and SACS will give the college its status.

This year MC will ask many of the same questions that SACS will.

"Maryville College wants to be free, flexible, and independent," Associate Dean Mardi Craig said, "so we have our own goals." She added, "We will ask ourselves how well we go about meeting our own goals and fulfilling our mission."

To answer this question, a Steering Committee made up of nine faculty members has been developed. Each faculty member will chair a committee made up of students, staff and faculty that will examine in depth a specific aspect of the college. The nine committees are Finances, Mission, Institutional Effectiveness, Library, Faculty, Organization and Administration, Academic Programs, Physical Resources, and Student Development.

Administrators will not sit on the committees. According to Craig, this was done purposely to avoid bias in the evaluation.

One tool the committee will use in compiling the results of the Self Study is a master survey which will ask all students to respond to certain questions concerning various aspects of the college, such as financial aid or the cafeteria. The committee will also refer to past student evaluations of classes and professors.

Craig sees the Self Study as a "self-improvement exercise" that will result in positive change.

"We want to accentuate the positive," she stated, "but look at the worsts."

Ferrin predicts MC "will see a subtle upgrading" in every area and that "we will see the institution just doing better than we have been."

MC student to present senior recital

A piano student at Maryville College will present her senior recital on Saturday, September 28 at 8 p.m. in the Music Hall on campus.

Sayuri Yamaguchi, a student of Sallie Schoen, associate professor of music at the college, will perform the "Chromatic Fantasy and Fugue" by Bach; Schumann's "Sonata in G Minor"; three compositions by the Japanese composer Ieiko Rimo; and two Liszt compositions.

Yamaguchi is from Hakko, Japan and is the daughter of Yukio and Kyoto Yamaguchi. The recital is free, and the public is invited.
